HOW FINDLEY WORKED

Confidence Man Got a String of Victims Here

Findley, the confidence man who made a desperate effort to work Douglas, the jeweler, on a bogus draft for $100, I and some others, is, it seems, the caught out saloon keeper for $10 and another for $10. One Henrywood was worked for $5. The Hotel Royal management was caught for $10 on a bogus draft. Findley evidently had a confederate. One day he stood at the door of the Royal and ran through the mail. Picking out a letter addressed to "W. H. Findley" he opened it and a $10 draft was enclosed. "Will you please cash that?" said Findley, as he showed the draft to the hotel clerk. He was accommodated. The draft was bogus.

He Doesn't Like Aquariums.

Why any one should ever have decided to own or to visit an aquarium is a mystery. The view of fish, enough when nicely grilled or when suspended at the end of a fishing line, is one of the most uninteresting of sights. The other animals which in confinement display traits which are more or less interesting. The fish has a sense of brilliant and displays it in the most phlegmatic way. Much he devotes the fish tender who has entered his affections into his eggs. The base in his things for home seems as much like the hypocrisy that the spectator of his active frequently feels an irresistible desire to hit him with a stick.

But the fish has not a single redeeming trait. He will swim around the tank in which he is confined with a pensiveness which is maddening to the serious spectator. He never engages in a genuine fight, but contents himself with an occasional surreptitious bite at an enemy's tail, which gives no true satisfaction to the beholder. If he happens to be a large snake-like disguised as an eel or an octopus or some other alarmingly ugly fish, he will sometimes swim directly at the glass through which the visitor is looking at him and thereby give the latter a momentary sensation of horror, but the average fish knows nothing for the public and treats the visitors with calm contempt. An aquarium without fish, like a seashore resort without the sea, is unobjectionable, but an aquarium with real water and real fish is the dullest object in nature.—W. L. Alden in Pearson's Magazine.

The Taxis Cab Driver.

Outside of many wine shops in Paris and in the principal cities of France a sign is often to be seen bearing the words, Au cocher fidèle ("To the faithful cocher"); beneath it a driver is pictured, hat in hand, restoring to a gentleman and lady the livery of the coach, a purse forgotten on the cushions of the vehicle. This is not a conception of the artist nor the fancy of the restaurant or wine shop to draw thither the coachman with a foible for the bottle, but a reality which often occurs and of which the cocher has every right to be proud.

Anybody who has lived any length of time in Paris will indorse the statement. Who has not forgotten an umbrella, a walking stick, a small satchel or some little object on the seat of fleur or a public vehicle? And who has not had his property restored without even having taken the number of the vehicle, without any remembrance of the physiognomy of the driver? By a simple application to a special office at the prefecture of police, where all objects found in public carriages are deposited and arranged according to the date and hour at which they were brought in, one is able promptly to regain possession of his lost property.

This reflects great credit on the Paris "cabbies," few of whom, by the way, are born Parisians.—Harper's Weekly.

He Concentrated.

Professor Combinefact is a small man with a large mentality. His wife is a tall woman, who believes in the power of matter over mind. The professor had been absorbed the whole evening in a profound paper on the mental characteristics of people who were unhappily married. Suddenly looking up he remarked:

"My dear, are you aware of the fact that a man's brain weighs about fifty pounds?"

"Humph! You've just read that, haven't you?"

"Of course, of course, you certainly of course.

"Well, that article says a woman's brain is not so heavy, eh?"

"Eh? Yes, it certainly does, too."

"And it also states that a woman's brain is of much finer quality, doesn't it?"

"Oh, yes, well, yes, you are quite right, my dear."

"Now, listen to me. Just imagine, dear, your husband trying to carry around with him a brain weighing fifty pounds, and trying to find it in a hurry from the other."

The professor arose, gathered his great head and as he passed for the door replied in tones of the most profound conviction, he muttered: "Why, you little thing, that would be superior to anything in my immediate sphere."—Lincoln Bills.

The Lesser Evil.

Bill—Don't you know you'll get a bill of fare in the restaurant? Jim—Yes, but I'd rather have a bill without getting it.—Chicago Record.

"Mr. Matthews."

The result of an examination was put up on the notice board of a well known examining establishment, and one of the attendants was spending the dull with as much interest as all of the breathless students. At the head of the list was written, "Matthews 500," and then the attendant's eyes noted there on be continued, "Why, that Mr. Matthews, he's always top, so he is."—London Globe.
