Rev. Mikelat Welcomed by the M. E. Church South

[illegible] the new pastor of the M. E. church was tendered a social reception last night at the home of R. S. Mathews, the recording steward of that church.

The Minister's analog was represented in all the phases of the other churches. Rev. W. C. Black of the First Presbyterian church made a short address of welcome, which was responded to by Rev. Mikelat for the city of Guthrie and the circles of church work here. The occasion was a most pleasant one and the programme was replete with good and instructive musical numbers. Light refreshments were served. The social was arranged in a large room fitted up and nothing lacked to make it the occasion.

The sending Independent H. H. Spurgeon was forced to and a bill for $[illegible] in the departure of Rev. Mathews and family. As Mr. Mikelat is to take charge of the church here on Sunday, he is due at a great and energetic worker for church [illegible] Mr. Mikelat has been in have become very popular in Guthrie. TURNED LOOSE THE SCHOOL

Of 450 Children in Order to Provide a Polling Place.

Twelve teachers and 450 children were turned out on the streets by a Republican school board in order to provide a polling place. This is an outrage on the taxpayers to the tune of $40.00 when a shack for a voting precinct could have been secured for $2.00, but it is likely the machine needed the janitor and superintendent to help push the G. O. P. along.

LOCAL BETTING.

Considerable Wagers Laid Yesterday and Today in the City

About $15,000 has been bet in Guthrie on the general territorial and county results. Favorite bets are:

Even $100 on McKinley.

$100 money that Flynn does not receive 1000 majority.

Even money that county Democratic ticket is in the lead.

Even money on Indiana and New York.

Odds on Ohio, Illinois and Kentucky.

W. H. Hagerman made eight bets last night that Brown, Neff and the county Democratic ticket would be elected.

WAKING AT NIGHT.

When I wake up alone at night,
I feel as if I had no eyes;
I stare and stare with all my might,
But only blackness round me lies.

I listen for the faithful sound,
And, though I strain with either ear,
The dark is silent all around,
It's just as if I could not hear.

But if I lie with there held fast,
A sort of mental vision like a sight—
Perhaps the darkness vanishing past,
Perhaps the substance passing by.

Perhaps the thoughts in people's hearts,
That keep so quiet all the day,
Wait till they're sleeping in their beds,
Then rustle out and fly away.

Or else they move like sleeping wings,
That flow with the first break of light
Not to the music of noisy things
But growing, growing in the night.

Children and little song and pups,

A WOMAN'S WISDOM

SHE PREFERRED A MAN OF ACTION.

Landor was at his desk, which was near the open window. The window looked down on the ponderous, ever-whirling traffic of South Water street. The grinding of huge wheels, the crashing of machinery, the clatter of hoof beats, the rattle of harness, the jarring of merchandise, the hoarse voices of porters and drivers, all rose in one mighty, mingled roar, a veritable bellow of commercial prosperity.

Landor did not notice the turmoil. He had become accustomed to it many months ago. He was absorbed, but not in his work. The minute hand had crawled quite around the dial of the big clock in the corner since he had formed a figure on the ledger lying open before him. But he had been writing. His gaze dropped to the page upon his desk. As he scanned the verse he had written his eyes took on the mingled dreaminess and sparkle one sees only in the orbs of a poet.

He drew from his desk a little glove, pearl colored and perfumed. There was inspiration in the sight, the scent, the touch of it. He laid it gently back, seized his pen and began on another stanza.

A brown hand reached over his shoulder. A couple of letters fell on the open ledger. One, the one in the firm, characteristic feminine hand he had come to know, he tore open with fingers that were clumsy through haste. Two, four, closely written pages! Her notes to him heretofore had been of almost telegraphic brevity. He plunged into the first page. Had all but read it through, indeed, before he paused. Then he raised back his head as though he had received a shock.

The letter had not been intended for him.

But it was for him. There was his name, his name in the writing of the woman he loved. To whom he had not dared to speak unless in sweet, wild verses which she never heeded. He had read so far unwittingly. He must now read the rest. After what he had ignorantly learned he must now learn more. It meant life and all that life held for him, the words which were traced on the next page. Life and love or bitter and enduring disappointment.

My Dear Friend: When you asked me lately if [illegible] I [illegible] Cecil [illegible] "I will be" you were. [illegible] I [illegible] I [illegible]

There the page ended.

The thunderous roar came from his ears now. There was a red light in them. He dug his nails into his palms until the flesh gorgeous pained.

He turned the page. He read on:

[illegible] I [illegible] But you may stay from my office that interests you will.

"Mr. Aldrich?" He looked up. He was trembling like a leaf. "About that special shipment to the Philippines, sir."

"Yes—no! I don't know. Ask the elevator boy!" he muttered, not comprehending, and again bent over the fateful page. The man shrugged his shoulders and walked away. Landor read on.

[illegible] of his character, his very [illegible] Who should appreciate them more than [illegible] who [illegible] Aldrich [illegible] Cecil [illegible] Cecil [illegible] Katherine Clairmont [illegible] Katherine Clairmont.

There was a muffled cry. The letter was crumpled in Royce Rogers. Then he lifted his bowed head, smoothed out the page and read on.
