ALLIES WORRY LITTLE OVER BIG LIFE LOSS

SMALL ITEM COMPARED TO VANTAGE GROUND WON IN BIG WAR

MUST BE BIG LOSSES TO FINISH WAR

BUT ALLIES CAN AFFORD LOSS BETTER THAN GERMANS, SAYS BRITISH

(By Associated Press.)

London, July 5.—To the civilian who notes the figures in the casualty lists issued every twenty four hours, and sees fresh convoys of wounded arriving daily at the big London railway stations, it seems that England is paying a terrible and ghastly price for advantage she is gaining by the "big push."

On first sight the opinions of the fighting men themselves are of interest, especially of leaders who are endeavoring to a somewhat larger purchase than is possible in the ranks. Chance afforded a London reporter an opportunity to obtain the views of two men on the question of casualties. It was when a hospital ship laden with wounded reached the landing stage at Southampton and he was permitted to go aboard.

"What do you think of the British casualties?" he asked the wounded officer in command of a battalion which played its part at Fricourt, Mametz Wood, and Bazentin. He was sitting well another officer, the Adjutant of a battalion which fought its way through La Boisselle to Contalmaison. Both were "walking cases," the with one machine-gun bullet in shoulder and arm, the other with bomb splinters in groin and side. One had the distinction of Loss for a standard [illegible] the other, the Adjutant, lost leave of the front since the early days of 1915.

"Well, there's a good many of them, of course, seeing the whole lot is a great [illegible] in here, it must be a [illegible]. There are a good many [illegible]. You can't move [illegible] on the western front, [illegible]. But I'm bound to [illegible] the number, but the [illegible] of them that impressed me [illegible]. I mean, of course, for the [illegible] to lose. What do you [illegible]?"

[illegible] in the Adjutant:

"[illegible] the casualties of operations [illegible] much the same as it has been all alongside on this front, but the [illegible] will page [illegible] different. [illegible] in our fighting and getting, it's [illegible] methods in a lump of [illegible] to speak, but in business [illegible] about the fighting out [illegible] if they are a good [illegible] it's worth a hundred thousand for [illegible]."

[illegible] the same battalion [illegible] said: "Perhaps you're [illegible] or some of [illegible]."
