GEOLOGISTS IN DEMAND IN THE STATE OIL FIELDS

MANY PRODUCING WELLS LOCATED; STUDENTS STUDY GEOLOGY

Geology is the most popular study at the University of Oklahoma. It is becoming the principal topic at the state school of mines at Wilburton. Students in other state educational institutions are digging into rocks and formations and studying structures.

It is all due to the fever for fortune through oil wells that produce petroleum in lots of a thousand barrels a day that is worth approximately a dollar a barrel. It is a mere matter of months for one to accumulate a million dollars at that rate. Even conservative citizens who have in the past been satisfied with 10 or 20 per cent interest a year are impelled to take flyers in leases where there is chance that oil wells will be developed.

The old-fashioned oil prospectors followed surface indications in the form of asphalt or were actuated by what sporting men call hunches. There are still a great many old-fashioned oil men in Oklahoma. But the geologist has begun to have a happy day. The geologists have been fortunate in Oklahoma in selecting likely places for oil wells.

University Interested in Work

Most of the geological data for Oklahoma during the last fifteen years while oil development has been active has come from the University of Oklahoma. About that long ago the head of the geological department there was studying oil formations. He has become famed as an oil finder under the handicap of half a mile of solid earth intervening between the surface and the oil sand.

It is somewhat of an exploit, this finding of oil under such circumstances. Of course, the oil has not always been found where the geologists has said it ought to be. Nearly always, however, the formation of the earth has been as forecasted by the geologist and it is certainly not his fault if oil has not been found in all the formations that and conducive to it.

So it has followed that the geology classes have become more and more plethoric of pupils. This year at the
