Mr. George C. Felton Does Not Know of Any Promotion.

When a writer for The Post called on Manager George C. Felton of the Houston office of the Western Union Telegraph company yesterday and asked regarding the statement in The Post yesterday under a Dallas date line, stating that Mr. Felton would succeed Mr. Cook at Dallas, the gentleman replied:

"If lightning should happen to strike in my vicinity I would try to survive the shock, but I am afraid I am a little out of the cyclone belt. The first I knew of the matter was what I saw in The Post and I do not know whether the reporter at Dallas is speculating or whether he is taking his statement on facts. I have no information that I will be advanced."

Should it prove true that Mr. Felton is to be transferred to Dallas and given a position higher than that he now holds he has many friends in Houston who, while regretting his departure from this city, will be glad to congratulate him upon the advancement. He has always been courteous and accommodating to all who have had business with the company in Houston and under his management the local work has been admirably conducted.

HIS NAME WAS VETO.

The Interesting Story of a Famous Man's Dog.

Gilbert Hamilton used to say: "I think it a divine Providence for having invented dogs, and I regard that man with wondering pity who can lead a dogless life." The boys, and a good many girls, agree with him that without Towser or Tiger to join in their romps or rambles half the pleasures of life would be lost.

Perhaps they will not be surprised to hear that most famous men have thought just as they do about it. There was Sir Walter Scott, who would hardly stir from Abbotsford without having a troop of dogs at his heels. He loved his pets so much that when Maida, a greyhound, had the cold, he used to get out of his carriage and carry her over the mud-puddles so that she might not get her feet wet. Wagner, the composer, was never without a faithful dog companion from the beginning to the end of his life.

Whittier's dogs are familiar to everyone. Robin, a great shepherd dog, was a favorite with the poet and one of his pictures shows him lying at the foot of the largest Norway spruce in New England.

President Garfield was also a dog-lover as became a country-bred man. Veto was one of the best known of his dogs. He was a familiar figure to the hundreds of citizens who flocked to the farm at Mentor after General Garfield was nominated for the presidency. Veto never approved of them, either. When the first party came to congratulate the general on his nomination Veto met them half-way in the lane and disputed further advance with many growls and barks. Not until his master appeared and assured him that all was all right would the dog let them pass.

Veto was a fine Newfoundland dog of large breed. He had a white face and shirtfront and the tip of his tail and his paws were white, too. He was a big puppy when General Garfield got him, but in two years he had grown into an immense and very intelligent dog of a dignified manner. He was intensely devoted to his master, but he never took kindly to the crowds that besieged Lawnfield after the general went into National politics.

Veto's evident unfitness for public life resulted in his being left behind when the Garfield family removed to Washington after the election, and he never saw his master again. After the president's death he was given to a family at Cleveland, Ohio.

In his new home he considered the house and its belongings his especial charge. One night he barked incessantly, but the new owner paid no attention. Then Veto howled until, in desperation, his master got out of bed and went to the barn prepared to give the dog something more than a talking to.

What he found, however, made him change his mind. A valuable horse had got loose and was tearing around the barn in danger of injuring himself and the other animals. Veto had succeeded in seizing the halter and there he stood, holding it end in his mouth, while the horse was vainly plunging and trying to get away.

According to another story, when the family came home late one night from a country fair they heard Veto barking frantically in the barn. The minute the door was opened he rushed to another barn several yards distant and close by a house occupied by a large family, who were all asleep. His master called him in vain and was about to use force to bring him home, when he saw a little tongue of flame shoot out of the roof of the neighbors' barn. Another and another followed, until the whole building was ablaze.

Before the fire department arrived the barn was destroyed and the house was saved only through the heroic efforts of the neighbors. Had it not been for Veto's ability to scent danger and his intelligence in warning people who knew what to do about it, the whole family would probably have been burned to death.

Perhaps you would like to know how Veto came by his curious name. About the time when the little Newfoundland puppy was given to General Garfield, a law was passed by congress abolishing the office of marshal of election. General Garfield did not approve of this action, and when president vetoed the bill, he was much pleased that he called his dog Veto in honor of the event.

Will Be a Pupil of Marchesi.

Chicago Tribune.

When Miss Mabel McKinley was asked by a girl friend whether she considered herself a "debutante" or not, she replied: "Well, I suppose I am really 'out' now, since I have been to the inaugural ball. It was my first and I found it perfectly delightful."

The future belle of the White House is enthusiastic about music, which she expects to be her career. She has a fine and well cultivated soprano voice and is looking forward with delight to becoming a pupil of Marchesi, which she expects to be in the near future.
