STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE.

Capitalism Aims Not to Kill Labor, but to Keep It In Submission.

This great principle that runs through all the realms of life has its most wonderful field of action in the affairs of human life.

The individual struggle of itself puts an intense strain upon the energies of men. Capitalism gives a peculiar direction to these individual struggles, pitting men at one another's throat in a manner not to be observed in the relations of the members of any other living species.

Among workingmen the struggle of the individual is not for the development of all his resources and does not tend to bring out his best qualities, nor does it result in his building up the character or the career of which he is abundantly capable. He is obliged to fight against his fellows in a bitter warfare for a job. Even when he combines with his colaborers in the union he cannot get free from this warfare with the other workers, his fiercest battles being against the strike breakers of his own class.

The struggle between the members of the exploiting class results in the survival and aggrandizement of the most brutal and inhuman of the species.

But the individual struggle is not the important line of this struggle for existence in human affairs. It is very secondary to the prodigious struggle of classes. A man's individual struggle will determine to which class he belongs and will give him the earmarks of his class, will develop the ideas and morals and habits in him that belong to his class.

The capitalist class cannot live at all without the working class from which to draw continually the surplus value upon which it thrives. Cut off the surplus value from labor's product and you thus destroy the capitalist class. Their struggle is not to kill the working class, but only to keep it in submission. For this they build their state, frame their laws, march their armies. For this they support their churches and their schools. For this they fight the battles against labor. It is a class struggle, more and more perfectly organized as the years go by. It is a struggle of a class for existence.

On the other hand, the working class has no heed at all for an exploiting class. It supports itself alone and in addition supports the exploiting class. Its struggle is not to keep the opposing class within bounds, but to destroy it altogether. When any portion of the laboring class perishes under the insatiable greed of the exploiters, then that portion of the exploiting class dependent upon that part of the laboring class perishes with it. But when the incubus of exploitation is lifted from any portion of labor the laboring class not only does not suffer, but is immensely benefited.—Common Sense.

Headed For Socialism.

Labor and capital cannot help organizing, Joe. Were they to stop organizing—that is, if they were to stop growing—they would die. They must organize, they must socialize, as corn must grow or hens lay eggs, because they cannot help it. Growth, organization, socialization, is the perfectly natural thing. Both labor and capital are obeying the law of self preservation. Production by machinery is the environment which compels association.

And when will these social forces stop organizing? They will not stop. They cannot. They are headed straight for Socialism and are already well along the road and will run over anything that gets in their way. Old methods, old institutions, old customs, ancient precedents, all give way to the social influence of modern machinery. The inventor is the basic social revolutionist.

A thousand plain, everyday facts define that Socialism is inevitable. The change from the competitive lack of system to the co-operative, systematized organization of industry is already half accomplished.—"Eight Letters to a Farmer."
