BRITISH DIPLOMACY

No small part of Great Britain's diplomatic game in the creation of prejudice against Germany in all parts of the scattered British Empire. War has united all elements because they believe that German militarism means oppression of all colonists if the empire goes down in defeat. In South Africa we had Louis Botha, premier of the federation, calling on the Boers to support and fight for their English conquerors with whom they waged one of the most desperate wars in all history only thirteen years ago. General Christian Rudolf de Wet, most redoubtable of the Boer raiders in that war, is now raising a force of South African scouts among the Boer people for service in Europe. South African colonial troops are now fighting German soldiers on the border. The Boers are like the Irish, the Poles and the Gurkhas, and their loyalty to the crown at the hour when the British Empire stands in greater peril than ever before since the days of the Spanish Armada is the chief triumph of that peculiar diplomacy which no rivals have ever been able to fathom. When the Ulster volunteers ordered ten thousand rifles in Germany fifty thousand were delivered without a word being said about payment. This gift of forty thousand rifles was a mystery then, but it is now clear that some one in Germany thought Ireland would rebel as soon as England became involved in a European war, which might have kept England out of it. Sending those extra rifles was part of that German diplomacy which mistook Great Britain's position and underrated her strength and resources. Great Britain's diplomatic counter strokes have deprived Germany and Austria-Hungary of the support of their ally, Italy, and have made Italy a menace to them. Three months ago the possibility of Great Britain calling two million soldiers to the colors would have been laughed at, but it will be an accomplished fact if this war drags along another year, which now appears to be England's desire.

CRIPPLED WAR MACHINE

THE elements which make for defeat or victory in modern warfare are greatly different from those which determined the fate of battles half a century ago. It has been reported from the European theater of war that the Germans lacked ammunition and other supplies during the battle which has brought a triumph to the arms of the allies. Just what caused the breaking of the German transportation system is not known, but one or two dispatches seem to shed some light. A dispatch from Paris stated that Germany was short of gasoline. If this was true it might have been a decisive element in the latest battle, for both the French and German armies depend for their supplies upon automobiles. In moving south through France the Germans found their way hampered by the destruction of railroad lines, tunnels and bridges, and they were compelled to depend for the most part upon transportation by motor vehicles. It is likely that the motor trucks and autos proved inadequate, and this would have been particularly the case if the Germans were short of fuel.

It is related in history that the southern states were defeated not so much by dearth of men as by a lack of supplies. In the last year of the war practically all of the copper boilers and other metal utensils were melted to make bullets and arms, because the south, outnumbered by an iron chain of armies on land and fleets on the sea, was without a sufficient source of metal supply. Austria and Germany are in a somewhat similar situation so far as oil is concerned. The chief source of supply are the American and the Russian fields, and the Teutonic allies are virtually shut off from these sources. Whether in their almost uncanny attention to details the German army chiefs overlooked such an element as this it is impossible to state, but it must be clear that by overlooking such an element the fate of the war might be determined.

The German soldiers are reported to have shown signs of drunkenness in the recent fighting. Who wouldn't show signs of drunkenness in the champagne country?

Emperor Francis Joseph and the Crown Prince of Germany have been killed three times each since the war began, but otherwise their health appears to be fairly good.

From the warfare zone he uses we think probably a mistake has been made as to the correct way of spelling Rustem Bey. Very likely it should be Rust-em Bey.

Parisians now fleeing Paris are accused of being cowards or ingrates; but perhaps they are only the old people who remember the rats of 1870.

"Just for a scrap of paper" England went to war; if Turkey and Greece join in, it will be just for another scrap.

Colliers on the St. Lawrence are more deadly than dreadnaughts. Up to date the death roll is higher.

Bordeaux is not fortified, but some of the biggest guns in France are there.

LAKE TAHOE SWEPT BY STORM ON TUESDAY LAST

According to the Carson News, one of the greatest storms experienced in years took place on Lake Tahoe on Tuesday and the steamers making the rounds of the lake had a most trying experience. Upon the arrival at Glenbrook many of the passengers postponed the journey around the lake until the following day, fearing the violence of the storm. The pier at Tahoe was badly injured by the force of the storm.
