HARDSHIP ENDURED BY OUR BOYS IN SIBERIA

(Correspondence Associated Press)

WITH THE AMERICAN FORCES IN NORTHERN RUSSIA, Dec. 26 — (Via London, Jan. 15)—One night spent in field headquarters of the American command holding the Dvina River front near Kadish (since abandoned) illustrated the difficulties which the troops faced in this desolate region in an Arctic winter.

Field headquarters were in a tiny square hewn log cabin, thatched with a roof of spruce boughs and heated by a homemade stove. Outside, in the forest, the troops, sheltered only by beaches of boughs, sentered around camp fires in the snow. In one shed but were a few cows, a peasant family and a field telephone.

The cold wind whistled through the cracks in the logs, and came up through cracks in the floor. The officers "turned in" early, wrapped in all the blankets and overcoats they could get.

Down along the banks of the Ice-filled Dvina river, a hundred yards from the Bolshevist lines, American outpost patrols stamped their boots on the frozen swamp ground in the trench, unable to build fires for fear of snipers.

"Rat-tat-tat," went the field telephone in headquarters hut.

The orderly called the machine gun officer. From the conversation it appeared that the water in the cooling chambers of the "emmagees" (the soldiers' pet name for machine guns) in the front line had frozen and that the guns would not work. Because there was no alcohol or glycerine handy, rum had been mixed as an antifreeze fluid, with the result that the guns would send down some new game. He went out to find that every gun in the place was in the same fix. A dozen row of them were brought inside the hut and stacked near the stove to thaw out.

"Therefore," ordered the machine gun officer, "sleep with the guns. Wrap them up in the same blankets with yourselves."

Meanwhile, someone filled up the stove to hasten the thawing out process of the guns nearby. The hut got so hot that an officer turned and tossed nervously in his sleep. Then a soldier rushed in to shout that the hut had been set on fire from the overheated chimney.

All turned out in the snow to empty canteens—the only unfrozen water at hand—on the roof to extinguish the fire.

Then the officers went back into the hut to shiver, for in saving the hut, the fire in the stove had been extinguished.

Not Scared by Cry of "Fad."

The wise man—the man who thinks—is not afraid of anything, new or old, because it may sneeringly be referred to as a "fad." He examines it to see if it is a good fad or a bad fad and accepts or [illegible] it accordingly.

LEAKY FIRE TANK BEING REPAIRED

One of the high pressure tanks on the slope of Mount Brougher has sprung a leak through natural causes and Fire Chief Askin has run the contents out to allow repairs to be made. The loss of water was not appreciable but the chief feared that with the coming of warm weather the shrinkage would increase the waste flow so he proceeded to have the seams caulked and hoops tightened to take up all the slack. In the event of a conflagration there is enough water in the compaion tank to give the fire department the required pressure and a sufficient supply to drown out Main street.

Saline Plants.

Saline plants are plants such as saltworts, seaweeds, grasswrack, seakale and asparagus, which grow on the seashore, or by the side of salt lakes, or in the beds of lakes which have dried up. They are rich in saline constituents, and when burnt their ashes were formerly used in the production of barilla, an impure carbonate of soda. This used to be employed in the manufacture of soap, glass and other products.
