Mrs. Allen and the Rain.

A Loving Couple.

The Catholic Parade—Personal.

ST. LOUIS, June 4th, 1877.

The editorial convention, which begins at Fredericktown Mo., to-morrow morning, seems to be one of those things to be reached through trials and tribulations and we hope, therefore, that some good may result from it. Dwarfed by cyclone, blinded by dust, drenched by rain, and the very earth over which the leaves seemed to be opened upon us until we reached Sedalia. It rained so hard that in many places the railroad track was washed, and we could only trust that these incidents of which we have heard or later, had been just where they would do the most good. The company on board the train generally attributed the storms to the fact that Mr. Ethan Allen had brought his wife along. Had lady had brought her own and Lexington for the years, to ward the county convention, very seldom leaving her own home even to go down town, and never leaving her children alone even a single night, though several of them are grown young ladies. Her consent to go abroad upon a train was looked upon by very many people as evidently portentious of something, and let the storm came, and the wind blew, and the Missouri River go upon such a rampage as has not been seen in other years.

The only incident of note on the ride to Sedalia, beside the rain, was the presence in our car of a couple married pair. When we saw that we could not know who they were, and never saw them before, it might be permissible to guess. We knew that they were newly married, or married at all. Regarding that we have to answer that if they were not married they ought to be, and in the case, part, was a man was. The look, the fondness, and evidently a good deal, and the face jewelry, bridal dresses and rolls like, we have decided that the bridal tour was the object of the journey. Why married, there could be no doubt, for whatever else could cause the cyclone to blow and the rain to pour down in such a manner as to drive the people of the car, this particular couple, the same special, and the same special, and the same special, upon every other, and every other, the same special, and the same special, and the same special, upon every other, and every other, the same special, and the same special, and the same special, upon every other, and every other
