THE SEATER CASE

Nearly a week has elapsed since the Seater robbery case was reported to the police, and Chief Sullivan still maintains a silence of painful profundity. If Mrs. Seater was really chloroformed and robbed in broad daylight in her apartments on Pike street, the two thugs whom she accuses of the crime are still at large and Chief Sullivan has done nothing to capture them. If no robbery was committed Chief Sullivan has done worse than nothing to correct the impression that has gone abroad that NEITHER LIFE NOR PROPERTY IS SAFE IN SEATTLE AND THAT CRIMINALS HAVE GROWN SO BOLD THAT THEY OPERATE IN BROAD DAYLIGHT.

Every country newspaper in the state of Washington has taken its fling at Seattle as a result of the publication of Mrs. Seater's story of the affair, and Chief Sullivan has so far ignominiously failed to make even a pretense of setting either the city or himself right in the eyes of their critics abroad. His alleged investigation of the fishy tale has only given it credence.

Of course Chief Sullivan is free to ignore what people may say derogatory to his reputation as a police officer. HE HASN'T MUCH TO DEFEND. But the people of Seattle are entitled to some consideration in this matter. EITHER A DARING CRIME WAS COMMITTED AND SHOULD BE PUNISHED, OR A MALICIOUS AND FOOLISH CANARD HAS BEEN SET AFLOAT AND SHOULD BE EXPLODED.

In either case it is up to Chief Sullivan to act. Seattle's enemies are quick to take advantage of each fresh outbreak of lawlessness under Chief Sullivan's feeble administration, and whatever Chief Sullivan, personally, may think of the Seater case, it is his duty as an official to take some action that will set the matter at rest.

PENSIONS FOR THE AGED

Joe Chamberlain proposes to make himself solid with the people of the British empire by pensioning them. He has formulated a bill to authorize every person in the united kingdom over 65 years of age, who has not been a pauper or convicted criminal, to receive a pension of from 5 to 8 shillings, or $1.25 to $2 a week. Half the money required is to be drawn from the imperial treasury and the other half from the local rates.

This is not pure philanthropy—it is politics. It is a sort of attempt to bribe the people of Great Britain, particularly of the colonies, with their own money.

The pension is offered in order to secure popular indorsement of Chamberlain's scheme of drawing the colonies closer to the mother country with preferential tariffs.

It is not the first time in the world's history that a people have been offered reward in their own money for support of a tariff, nor is it likely to be the last.

A great aggregate sum will evidently be required to pay the annual pensions. It is estimated that one-seventh of the entire population of the united kingdom over 60 years of age is dependent upon charity. The Australian Review of Reviews says that in New Zealand every second person over 65 years of age already has a state pension; in Victoria about every third person above that age is fed by the state; in New South Wales the proportion is nearly that of New Zealand.

A pension has a seductiveness hard to be resisted. As a political appeal it is perhaps the most effective ever devised. But while it will no doubt attract to Chamberlain's support many of the poorest of British subjects in all climes, it is likely to turn from him a large number of others who control more votes than they. Opposition to the measure is already developing, one of the objections to it being that the industrious and thrifty will be taxed to encourage indolence and improvidence.

Yet, Great Britain's subjects have so long been taxed to the limit of endurance, without getting appreciable returns, that any proposition for them to get back again a part of the money they pay in taxes must meet with considerable favor.

WHY SOME MEN FAIL

"More men fail from want of force than from want of judgment," said Dr. Smith, who preached the baccalaureate sermon at New York university, "and it would appear that education often tends to weaken instead of strengthen the will power of a man."

This very deftly hits the nail on the head.

Knowledge develops caution and an indisposition to take risks. It also develops sensibilities that are so finely attuned that the possessor of them is apt to go a long way round to avoid a shock to them, and thereby loses the race. Some ignorant man with narrow vision has seen nothing but a short cut across, and has taken it.

While Knowledge, confused and rendered timid by its breadth of view, is weighing complications and considering chances, Ignorance, seeing nothing but the end to be attained and the means, plunges blindly and recklessly onward—and triumphs.

The educated man is apt to spare himself at crucial times. He is apt, too, to place a far lower estimate upon material successes than does the ignorant man. He sees far more in life than a warm back and a full stomach, and so his aspirations and efforts are divided.

It is perhaps not so much a lack of force as a division of it.

Dr. Smith has scored a strong point against higher education, if we are to look upon mere selfish achievement as the standard of success. But, on the other hand, the educated man has subjective delights independent of material achievement that must be counted into the reckoning.

The Marine Review has turned its attention to the theory of two German savants that the north pole is to be reached by submarine boat and mercilessly ridicules and annihilates it. But will the Review, which is such high authority on such matters, kindly inform an anxious world how the pole is to be reached?

Surprise is being expressed at Roosevelt's hearty reception by the Mormons. But why surprise? Isn't he after their own hearts on the question of race suicide?

ROASTED JILLSON

Jim White, Abe Rutherford and C. White, the three men charged with having brutally beaten George Jillson at Enumclaw a few weeks ago, were discharged by Judge Cann yesterday and the prosecuting witness severely roasted for having, as Judge Cann expressed it, "had the audacity to make such a complaint when he was the only real criminal who was connected with the matter."

Several prominent citizens of Enumclaw, in the presence of about 300 other persons, took a hand in the horsewhipping of Jillson. He came to Seattle the next day and secured warrants charging the ringleaders with assault and battery.

It developed in the trial that the immediate cause of Jillson being punished was that he had taken a little boy, Oliver Dailey, out driving, and had driven so carelessly that the wheel was taken off the wagon and the boy thrown out and seriously hurt. Jillson had been in the bad graces of the community for some time because he had opened a house of ill-fame in the center of the town.

The man has acted in such a peculiar manner for some time that he is believed to be insane.

THE MARKETS

The hot wave along the Pacific coast is responsible for a rise in prices of lemons during the last two days that is phenomenal. From $2.50 and $3.25 per crate they have jumped to $3.50 and $5.00—in fact, any price the uncharitable wholesale dealer may wish to charge. The dealers say the prices in Seattle are lower than in any city north of Los Angeles, and that they will remain where they are for at least a month.

Lemons in Sothern California will be corralled before they can reach Seattle, and be sent to San Jaked Eastern cities. In that case lemonade will be difficult to secure, even in such prohibition places as Bremerton.

Cabbage has declined 25c per cwt., and asparagus has weakened. Apricots advanced 25c per crate.

HOW THE BRIGADIER TOOK THE FIELD AGAINST THE MARSHAL MILLEFLEURS.

"Halloa!" said he. "It's Gerard!" You would have thought by his manner that I had met him by appointment. For my own part, I would have embraced him had he but come an inch of the way to meet me.

"I thought we were in for some sport," said he. "I never dreamed that it was you."

I found this tone of disappointment somewhat irritating. Instead of being glad at having met a friend, he was sorry at having missed an enemy.

"I should have been happy to join in your sport, my dear Bart," said I. "But I really cannot turn my sword upon a man who saved my life."

"Tut, never mind about that."

"No, it is impossible. I should never forgive myself."

"You make too much of a trifle."

"My mother's one desire is to embrace you. If ever you should be in Gascony——"

"Lord Wellington is coming there with 60,000 men."

"Then one of them will have a chance of surviving," said I, laughing. "In the meantime, put your sword in your sheath!"

Our horses were standing head to tail, and the Bart put out his hand and patted me on the thigh.

"You're a good chap, Gerard," said he. "I only wish you had been born on the right side of the channel."

"I was," said I.

"Poor devil," he cried with such an earnestness of pity that he set me laughing again. "But look here, Gerard," he continued, "this is all very well, but it is not business, you know. I don't know what Massena would say to it, but our chief would jump out of his riding boots if he saw us. We weren't sent out here for a picnic—either of us."

"What would you have?"

"Well, we had a little argument about our hussars and dragoons, if you remember. I've got 50 of the Sixteenth all chewing their carbine bullets behind me. You've got as many fine-looking boys over yonder, who seem to be fidgeting in their saddles. If you and I took the right flanks we should not spoil each other's beauty—though a little blood-letting is a friendly thing in this climate."

There seemed to me to be a good deal of sense in what he said. For the moment Mr. Alexis Morgan and the countess of La Ronda and the abbey of Almeixal went right out of my head, and I could only think of the fine level turf and of the beautiful skirmish which we might have.

"Very good, Bart," said I. "We have seen the front of your dragoons. We shall now have a look at their backs."

"Any betting?" he asked.

"The stake," said I, "is nothing less than the honor of the Hussars of Conflans."

"Well, come on!" he answered.

"If we break you, well and good—if you break us, it will be all the better for Marshal Millefleurs."

When he said that, I could only stare at him in astonishment.

"Why for Marshal Millefleurs?" I asked.

"It is the name of a rascal who lives out this way. My dragoons have been sent by Lord Wellington to see him safely hanged."

"Name of a name!" I cried. "Why my hussars have been sent by Massena for that very object."

We burst out laughing at that, and sheathed our swords. There was a whirr of steel from behind us as our troopers followed our example.

"We are allies!" he cried.

"For a day."

"We must join forces."

"There is no doubt of it."

And so, instead of fighting, we wheeled our half squadrons round and moved in two little columns down the valley, the shakos and the helmets turned inwards, and the men looking their neighbors up and down, like old fighting dogs with tattered ears who have learned to respect each other's teeth. The most were on the broad grain, but there were some on either side who looked black and challenging, especially the English sergeant and my own sub-officer, Papillette. They were men of habit, you see, who could not change all their ways of thinking in a moment. Besides, Papillette had lost his only brother at Busaco. As for the Bart and me, we rode together at the head and chatted about all that had occurred to us since that famous game of ecarte of which I have told you.

For my own part, I spoke to him of my adventures in England. They are a very singular people, these English. Although he knew that I had been engaged in 12 campaigns, yet I am sure that the Bart thought more highly of me because I had had an affair with the Bristol Bustler. He told me, too, that the colonel who presided over his court-martial for playing cards with a prisoner, acquitted him of neglect of duty, but nearly broke him because he thought that he had not cleared his trumps before leading his suit. Yes, indeed, they are a singular people.

At the end of the valley the road curved over some rising ground before winding down into another wider valley beyond. We called a halt when we came to the top; for there, right in front of us, at the distance of about three miles, was a scattered, gray town, with a single enormous building upon the flank of the mountain which overlooked it. We could not doubt that we were at last in sight of the abbey that held the gang of rascals whom we had come to disperse. It was only now, I think, that we fully understood what a task lay in front of us, for the place was a veritable fortress, and it was evident that cavalry should never have been sent out upon such an errand.

"That's got nothing to do with us," said the Bart; "Wellington and Massena can settle that between them."

"Courage!" I answered. "Pire took Leipzig with 50 hussars."

"Had they been dragoons," said the Bart, laughing, "he would have had Berlin. But you are senior officer; give us a lead, and we'll see who will be the first to flinch."

"Well," said I, "whatever we do must be done at once, for my orders are to be on my way to Abrantes by tomorrow night. But we must have some information first, and here is someone who should be able to give it to us."

There was a square, whitewashed house standing by the roadside, which appeared, from the bush hanging over the door, to be one of those wayside tabernas which are provided for the muleteers. A lantern was hung in the porch and by its light we saw two men, the one in the brown habit of a Capuchin monk and the other girt with an apron, which showed him to be the landlord. They were conversing together so earnestly that we were upon them before they were aware of us. The innkeeper turned to fly, but one of the Englishmen seized him by the hair and held him tight.

TO DEBATE SOCIALISM

REV. W. M. KELLOGG AND A. G. SEIFERT MEET SUNDAY

A joint debate, under Socialist auspices, will be held Sunday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock between Rev. W. M. Kellogg, representing the National Economic League of New York, and Alonzo G. Seifert of this city, representing the Socialist party. The debate was arranged by correspondence and is looked forward to with great interest, by the Socialists of the city especially.

Dr. Kellogg is a former resident of Seattle and is a debater of national reputation. Mr. Seifert was recently his party's candidate for mayor and is also well skilled in argument.

WILL COMMAND ONE OF HILL'S STEAMERS

Captain G. H. Pierce, master of the troopship Sheridan, and formerly marine superintendent of the transport service, is soon to command the largest steamer plying in Pacific waters. He has been offered and has accepted the command of one of James J. Hill's giant liners which will ply between Seattle and the Orient. The vessels now building are the Dakota and Minnesota, both being 21,000-ton steamers. The Minnesota was recently launched on the Atlantic coast.

Captain Pierce has arrived at San Francisco from Manila on the Sheridan, making his last trip as master of an army transport.

Before going East to take command of his new charge, Captain Pierce will take an extended vacation.

RIVAL STEAMBOATS RACE EACH DAY

Races on the Seattle-Whatcom run are of almost daily occurrence now owing to the competition of the companies operating steamers on the route. The Bellingham Bay Transportation Company's Bellingham, L. T. & T. Company's Utopia, and the Pacific Coast Company's Sehome leave Whatcom at 8 o'clock in the evening. From then on it is a three-cornered race to Seattle. One vessel wins one day and another the next day, according to the lengths of stops at way ports and other causes.

The first lap, between Whatcom and Fairhaven, is generally watched by nearly 200 people who ride on the boats just to be in the race.

LARGE PLANT TO UTILIZE FISH REFUSE

(Special to The Star.)

FAIRHAVEN, Wn., June 10.—The old fertilizing plant at Smugglers Cove, Lummi Island, has been leased by the receivers of the Pacific American Fisheries Company, by whom it is being enlarged and equipped for a complete reduction and fertilizing plant. The building is being enlarged, the wharf extended, and new machinery is now on the way to increase its capacity and equip it for the finer products, such as fish oil, glue, etc. The plant will be able to take care of all refuse from the canneries and nothing will be allowed to fall into the water from the Fairhaven canneries.

In addition to taking care of the refuse from the canneries, the company's intention is to keep the plant in operation the greater part of the year in manufacturing into useful products fish that are themselves unfit for food and are foes to food fishes. The enormous quantity of refuse from salmon canneries that have been dumped from the canneries of the lower sound during the past four or five years have caused a rapid multiplication of dog fish, a fish that is rich in oil, and it is believed that a large supply of these fish can be obtained for the new plant.
