The Bulletin.

Statistics of Suicide.

A German professor, Von Oettingen, has just published a book on "Biblical Statistics," which proves the facts in regard to suicide more fully than they are found anywhere else. He declares that suicide, like insanity, to which it is closely related, is constantly increasing in Europe, out of proportion to the growth of the population. His figures for 45 years in Prussia, and 65 years in France, show that the reported increase in suicide has been, in Prussia, two and a half times, and in France more than nine times as rapid as that of the population. It is a curious fact that frequency of suicide, in any given year, increases and decreases with the length of the days. This is true, not only on the whole, but in each separate land, and even in each great city. Everywhere there are more suicides in June and July, and fewer in November, December and January, than in any other months. This is found to have been as uniformly the case in former years, as from 1865 to 1869, as it now is. Of every 1,000 self-murders in Europe, it is found that 84 take place in January, 68 in February, 79 in March, 88 in April, 106 in May, 113 in June, 108 in July, 92 in August, 79 in September, 76 in October, 66 in November, and 60 in December. And even in London, where the fogs of November are popularly regarded as melancholic and suicidal, that month is found actually to furnish but 4½ per cent of all the suicides, while June and July report each more than 11 per cent.

It is doubtful whether the American statistics would agree with the European in this respect. Few have ever been collected here, and these chiefly in New England. Of 18 suicides in Rhode Island in 1868, 3 were in April, 2 in June, 3 in July, but 4 in December. Of 75 suicides in Massachusetts in 1863, 4 were in January, 8 in February, 4 in March, 6 in April, 4 in May, 6 in June, 8 in July, 9 in August, 4 in September, 9 in October, 11 in November, and 3 in December. Here were no suicides in the six coldest months, and 50 in the six warmest. Not has the increase in suicides in Massachusetts been equal to the increase in population. In the 21 years preceding 1863, when the average population was not more than a million, the average annual number of suicides was 77½ in the four years, 1863-66, with an average population of at least 1,220,000 the average number was only about 71½, an increase of less than 8 per cent, while the population had increased more than 23 per cent. European statistics show that for every million of the population the yearly number of suicides among the Scandinavians is 120, the Germans 142, the French 183, the Italians in general 80, and among the Slavs in the Austrian provinces only 57. But great cities show much higher figures—Paris the digest of all, where there are yearly 646 suicides for each million of people. It is curious, that among the Germans, suicide is the most frequent in Saxony, and next in the countries or provinces adjoining, so that its frequency steadily decreases in passing from Saxony as a centre in any direction all the way to the boundaries of Germany.

In every country three-fourths of all the suicides are of the male sex. But in every country, and in both sexes, the disposition to commit this crime increases with advancing years, and is always greatest in extreme old age. And it seems to be among persons in advanced life that the greatest increase in suicide of recent years has taken place. It is clearly provided, also, that marriage is one of the circumstances which bear a statistical relation to this subject. The proportion of unmarried persons who kill themselves is decidedly greater than that of the married; the proportion of widowed persons is far larger still; but that of the divorced and separated is incomparably as great as that of the married. In Massachusetts, so far as known, these statistics hold good with respect to sex, age, and civil condition. The manner of death is not reported here, but in France, of a hundred male suicides, drowning is the choice of 26, hanging of 23 or 24, shooting of 14 or 15, stabbing or cutting of 4 or 5, precipitation from height of 3, breathing carbonic acid gas of four 5, and poison of 2. But of the same number of women who kill themselves, 14 or 15 do it by drowning, 20 by hanging, 3 or 4 by throwing themselves from a height, 14 by carbonic acid, 4 by poison; while only one in nearly two hundred shoots herself. Yet there have been some changes in these figures, for drowning has gone partly out of fashion during the last thirty years, and shooting still more so, while hanging has taken its place, especially among the men, of whom twenty years ago, only 21¼ per cent hanged themselves, instead of 24 per cent as now. It is believed to be particularly those suicides who are driven to the act by the most wrecked motives, and by want of drink or dissipation, and sheer weariness of life, that thus use the rope, and a disproportionate amount of the whole increase of suicide in late years is of this class. This shows what has been believed on other evidence, that intemperance in Europe is increasing. The contrary seems to be the case here.

Freed.

"Howard Glyndon" writes to the New York Evening Mail that she is very tired of certain things which she names. We quote as follows:

I am tired of meeting, here, there and everywhere, women with hair standing on end, and frizzled enough to frighten every unsophisticated foreigner into the woods. I cannot understand why, when all the coffee-colored and cream-colored women are trying so hard to get the kinks out of their wool, all the white women should be laying with all their might and main to convert their straight locks into woolly ones. It is the result of mutual admiration, I suppose.

I am so tired of seeing short men in low hats and long men in high hats.

I am tired of hearing women talking about "rights" and scorning "privileges," and then getting into a street-car to look daggers at every man who doesn't spring up in a jiffy to give them his place. I want them to look into Webster, and find out whether "rights" and "privileges" come under the same head, and mean one and the same thing.

I am ineffably and insufferably tired of seeing any and every woman's dress described in the newspapers.

I am tired of seeing men give dinners for the purpose of making speeches; and seeing women go to church for the sake of dressing.

And of seeing people get married just for the sake of getting a divorce.

I am so tired of the "German" that I can't rest.

And I am almost certain that "Shoo Fly," in some one of its various guises, will be the cause of my committing murder some day not very far ahead, in the future.

I am so tired of the lack of respect shown for literature as a profession, which causes every man who has failed in everything else to be sure that he can succeed as an author, as an editor, or as an artist.

And of the lack of personal dignity which causes every woman who is afraid of a little hard work, to take up so readily with the idea that she can make a fortune by exhibiting herself personally, under the gas-lights of a public platform, and gabbling over nonsense which she calls "a lecture" for the hearing of which divers persons, of equal silliness, are willing to pay fifty cents a head; when, on the contrary, they should not be willing to listen to such a string of unmeaning sentences, even if they were paid five dollars individually for so doing.

MEDICAL.

Prostration Played Out.

Violent perspirations, emotions, exhausts, blisters and nervous irritation had their day. The sufferer no longer be persuaded that the best way to cure them is to destroy the little strength that she has left them.

Perspiration, instead of doing themselves with cream, talks, wines, acrylic, pump and other powerful stimulants, some their relative organs and requires more nerves. With Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.

Persons of leisure habit, instead of throwing themselves upon a sofa or couch in a state of mental prostration, if nervous, lassitude, weak nerves and Fine A, in the operation of that wholesome vegetable alterative, figure the disease vanishes.

Nervous sufferers, languid, tired and dejected, are invigorated and cheered as by a glass of cordial, and sleep the very moment the stomach and liver, of consciousness were superseded by an unclouded consciousness, perfectly refreshed and entirely invigorated.

Thousands of cases have occurred in the present year of a most decisive character, fully demonstrating that the evil effects of malaria, from sea exhalations, and from the disturbing influences of changes of temperature and changes of water.

The sick and debilitated feel their strength return, and their spirits revive under its healing, supporting and invigorating action.
