BRITISH PLAY IS DIFFERENT

Contrast In the Educational System of England and America.

NO ORGANIZED GAMES

House Parties Disclose Early Environment of the Boys and Girls.

(By Margaret Walter)

LONDON, Sept. 3.—The different effect upon character between the American educational system and that of England is much in evidence over here at the English summer schools and camps where there are quite a number of American students, and at country house parties where for the first time since the war young Americans are among the guests.

In England, except in welfare centers and settlements, there is no organized play after the primary years. The national game of cricket, it is true, is taken very seriously, but that and football are hardly looked upon as games at all. There is a great deal of time allotted to them in the regular school course and masters take their part and have their standing in the cricket field as well as boys.

At summer camps and schools when the regular work and lectures of the day are over the members are left entirely to their own devices to roam the woods, bicycle, bathe, play games, boat or sightsee if they are in a historic neighborhood, as is usually the case.

THE BRITISH PLAN

It is the rarest thing to find more than two or three people doing anything together. Summer schools are so loosely organized that individuals may join without ever taking part in any game or excursion. Where in America every hour of the day from the morning bugle to taps is arranged for, and the whole company takes part ni every function with almost military regulation, in England two boys may take their early morning plunge, another two will be off for a hike, several will scramble out only in time for breakfast, and so on through the day. The boy who is interested in collecting will be off betimes with his case and nets or snares, often alone, though he may compare notes in the evening with a kindred spirit.

For one thing most English children are early schooled to solitary amusement, and it is considered the worst manners to intrude upon another's privacy. Beginning in the nursery children are left almost entirely to themselves during play hours The whole of English domestic tradition tends towards this.

In country life the youngster who does not ride or hunt must find his own recreation, and this he proceeds to do with a complacency which is the furtherest possible removed from self-pity.

HOUSE PARTIES SHOW DIFFERENCE

Nothing could illustrate the difference between the way children are brought up better than watching two sets of guests in a big country house party The Americans are at first stunned by the dreariness, the apparent lack of effort to amuse them. They wander about in depressed droves enquiring what they can do next.

Small English guests, on the other hand, take in the possibilities of the place at once. They are old hands at appraising the resources of their parents' friends' establishments. They find out the rules of the house, the hours of meals and then make their plans with a completeness which precludes interference. In this way small guests may be entertained for weeks without their presence ever being discovered by the grown-up visitors.

In a great many families the children are sent from house to house among relations with staffs of nurses and maids, and long before they are grown they know all the ins and outs of visiting and all the advantages and peculiarities in the different country houses of their set. There are no more amusing documents than the broadcast letters letters written by these children to their hostesses, and no more touching revelations than their letters written home.

"MY PLAYER WITH A GHOST

"I have found a rather amusing game" wrote a small girl to her mother after a couple of nights in a great barren Scottish castle. "Everybody is out shooting all day and the only person left is the ghost. We got acquainted in the library the other afternoon where I was reading an old book about our family. Just as I got to the thrillingest part the dear little ghost. We got acquainted in the library and now we are friends as well as being relations. She says she was like me when she was my age."

It is significant of the English code that the mother upon receipt of this letter did not whisk off her little daughter to more cheerful surroundings as an American mother would have done done. On the contrary she allowed the child to finish her visit, but constantly wrote her leters full of practical things and pleasant realities. Her idea was that the child was a normal healthy youngster and that she might as well begin early to face experience. To have taken the child away, to have shielded her from anything that came across her path in the ordinary course would to an English mother, be unsportamanlike.
