"John Gilpin's Ride."

London Magazine.

"John Gilpin's Ride" was composed by Cowper somewhere about the year 1780 or 1782 and under the following circumstances, as he told them himself: While or a visit to his friend and admirer, Lady Austen he was suffering one evening from excessive melancholy, which her ladyship thought to relieve by relating to him a funny story. It was a story she remembered from childhood and which she had so often related to the little ones gathered at her house. "John Gilpin's Ride" she denominated her tale, and she went on and told it in a bright, sparkling, narrative style. Its effects on the fancy of Cowper were enchanting. On the following morning he appeared at the breakfast table all smiles, and he told Lady Austen that he had been kept awake half the night by thoughts of her story and his involuntary bursts of laughter at the comical scenes flashed back upon him. And he furthermore told her that he had resolved to put it into a ballad, the general construction of which he had already in his mind. The ballad was written and given to Lady Austen, and she insisted upon giving it to the publisher of her favorite newspaper. So it found its way to the public and afterward Henderson, the actor, recited it in his public reading. There have been various surmises as to where Lady Austen obtained her hero. Some have thought he was a real personage and have culeated proof to sustain the position, while others have believed him to have been entirely fictitious—a creature of Lady Austen's brain, or, mayhap of the poet's own fancy.

AT Sibley, the other day, W. H. Gates fell thru the roof of the Congregational church in the ground, a distance of sixteen feet, and forcefully struck on his head and shoulders against a lot of bricks, he was not seriously
