FORESEES TIME WHEN DRAMA WILL BORROW FROM SCREEN

That the time is come, prophesied some months ago, when the dramatic stage will find material for dramatic theaters in some of the best original photoplays written originally for the screen, is the opinion of Hector Turnbull of the photodramatic staff of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play company, who arrived in New York last week to confer with many well known authors and dramatists who are under contract to write for the Lasky company.

Mr. Turnbull's own experience is an interesting illustration of the way that the screen itself has paved the way for a field itself capable of furnishing material from the dramatic stage or screen. Within recent days, subsequent to the first presentation in New York at the Strand theater of Mr. Turnbull's photoplay "The Chest" with Fannie Ward, produced by the Lasky company, several Broadway theatrical managers advanced offers for the dramatic rights to "The Chest." Arrangements have been completed by which A. H. Woods has secured the dramatic privileges to "The Chest."

It was only a short time ago, says Mr. Turnbull, "when the screen was almost wholly dependent upon plays or well known novels suitable for translating to the motion picture. The photodrama as an art has developed along lines quite parallel to the stage and yet decidedly distinct. It was only natural that the stage and the library should furnish a ready material but it was not necessary that the screen was to be wholly dependent upon these resources. If for no other reason than the fact that several million people will see every good feature that is produced, it should be sufficient inspiration for well known writers to concentrate upon the motion picture as a medium, not even the newspapers or national magazines, has the man who has something to say an audience so enormous as that provided by the motion picture.

"As for the adaptation of the stage of well known screen plays it follows as a natural course that this is to be a step in the evolution and development. With all its wonderful powers of illusion, strength of characterization, its breadth of atmosphere, its extraordinary detail, the motion picture when it does successfully translate to the screen a well known stage production, nevertheless leaves its action more of pantomime, subsidiary to the spoken word. The fact that the screen has been able to overcome this handicap by accentuating other features of entertainment and illusion is not to discredit the motion picture but on the contrary to compliment it. There have been, however, several original photoplays which possess splendid opportunities for the dramatic stage. When you consider that these are of all kinds to compete successfully with filmed versions of drama, it follows as a natural course that when they are selected and elaborated with careful thought they are certain to be the strongest of all photoplays, as perfect and as effective as the best plays written essentially for the drama.

One of the reasons which brought Mr. Turnbull to New York was to confer with well known authors who are under contract with the Lasky company, among whom are Rennold Wolf and Channing Pollock, Willard Mack, author of "Kick In," and "So Much For So Much," and other successful plays; Jules Eckert Goodman who dramatized "Treasure Island" and other authors.

The Lasky company was one of the first producing organizations to fully realize the importance of the story on the screen and the history of the organization has constantly reflected its effort to enlist the best contemporary writers for the photodrama.

Fire Escapes

In most of the hotel rooms one is incarcerated in, are some sort of rope halters hanging by a window. These are marked "fire escapes." Usually these have a sort of board attachment that serves as a spool to wind them up on.

Frequently when in hotels equipped with these mysterious puzzles, we have worked until away along in the night trying to find how the thing worked.

We have always given them up.

We have given this rope puzzle much thought, while doing time in hostelries in various states, and have come to the definite conclusion that if any hotel takes fire while we are a part of its contents, and it comes to a square decision between burning up and trying to use that thing before a lot of strangers, we should stay in the room and incinerate.

O Death, where is thy sting?

We dare you, old Death, to show anything as unpleasant as trying to solve one of those clothes-line fire-escape puzzles.
