TRAINING THE LIVELY FLEA

Charles Kleeko training fleas in his animal shop in New York city. Flea training is a sideline with Mr. Kleeko, who hires out squads of the trained insects to circus performers. Fleas are easily trained, according to Mr. Kleeko. He takes a good-sized freaky flea from one of his animals and puts it in a small glass bowl which is covered at the top. It is naturally anxious to escape from the bowl, and is attempting to do so is jumped quite frequently. After a time it stops jumping. Mr. Kleeko then takes it from the bowl and harnesses it to a small cardboard chariot which it hauls about, urged on by a straw in Kleeko's hands. After a time it harnesses the flea begins to ever could jump.

E. K. LINCOLN TOPS AN ALL-STAR CAST IN ZANE GREY PICTURE

"Desert Gold" Boasts of Two of the Most Popular Players on the Screen

The cast of Zane Grey's picture, "Desert Gold," produced by Benjamin B. Hampton and Enrique F. Warner for Zane Grey Pictures, Inc., a W. W. Hodkinson release, to be shown at the Columbus theater Thursday, reads like a page from "Who's Who in Filmdom." Seldom if ever before has such an all-star cast been gathered, and never before is it being in life the novel of a famous author to showing the cast more than 200 players were interviewed. Among the principals are such famed personages as E. K. Lincoln, W. Lawson Butt, Edward Coxen, Frank Lanning, Walter Long, William Dainbridge, Margery Wilson, Arthur Morrison, Russell Simpson and Laura Winston.

E. K. Lincoln has been a reader "fan" of Zane Grey for years, and although the star and the author had never met, Mr. Grey so greatly admired Mr. Lincoln's work that he wanted him for "Dick Gale." W. Lawson Butt, the famous English actor, was chosen by Mr. Grey nearly a year ago to create the role of the Yaqui.

For the part of the dashing border captain, "George Thorne," Edward Coxen was chosen as ideal and to the man who has won fame by such virile roles as he played in "Carmen of the Klondike," the part of "Captain Thorne" opened wonderful new opportunities. The extremely important "heavy," "Ishpat," the bandit chief is taken by the "worst hated man in pictures," Walter Long, whose work as "Gus" in Griffith's "Birth of a Nation" will be recalled everywhere.

The women's roles are in the hands of beautiful golden-haired Eileen Percy and the dark and willowy Margery Wilson, players notable for some remarkable screen achievements.

Clever Ideas in Street Suits

DISTINCTION in dress is a much desired and a subtle thing, and few women may achieve it by following slavishly the ever-changing fashions. It depends more knowing how to wear clothes for one thing. This is especially true of street dress, where few women choose instead of fitting for dress. They prefer styles that "are in the mode," that is, generally accepted. Hay occasionally along comes a genius who can "carry off" an innovation in street dress, in the silhouette, one part of her clothes, and in another their criticism; but they are apt to call her freakish and her styles bizarre.

The coat and skirt in suits in the composition in the two pictures shown above. Both are suits altogether practical and the same kinds of materials are used for making them. In the suit at the right there is a bit to emphasize the waistline. Without this bit of boudoir work of the Chinese dame would be lost, but the suit would not look unfinished, for it is so clever and original. Still, all one can say of it is, that it has a plain skirt and a coat that dons like a utility blouse. The big ribbon of braid on top of the hat and the hanging queue of braid at the back bespeak a Chinese boudoir.

There are several new style features in the other suit, including pin tucks in the coat, a wide tuck in the skirt, the folded girdle and big buckle. But most important are triangular tucks in the front, back and sides of the coat.
