General Howe's Aid

A Story of the American Revolution

One morning during the war for independence, while the British occupied New York and portions of New Jersey, the Americans were watching a force occupying a small fort lying between Newark and Elizabeth. The fort was built in the way of the Americans, rendering the communications between their different leaders difficult. A force was sent to capture it, but the stronghold was well stocked with ammunition and provisions, so that it would likely be able to hold out for a long while against an attacking party. The Americans, not knowing of a weak spot where an entrance could be used, dared not try to storm it.

The commander of the patriots surrounded the fort on the north, south and west sides, leaving communication with the enemy open on the east. One morning the garrison saw an officer in a British uniform galloping over the hills from the point that had not been closed. He rode through a fire from the American guns, but he was beyond the range of only a few of them, and none of their shots took effect. He made his entrance into the fort and was received with acclamations by the garrison, all being interested to know why he had risked his life to join them. No one knew him, but he introduced himself as an aid to General Howe at New York.

"Major," he said to the commanding officer, "the general is extremely anxious that this post be held. He has ordered me to inspect it, its garrison, ammunition, provisions, etc., and report to him exactly what you require to make a successful defense. As soon as I gain the required information I shall return, and anything you need will be dispatched immediately."

"But how did it happen that the rebels let you get in here?" asked the major.

"That is their affair. Who has blundered at leaving open a passageway I can't know. I expected to be obliged to pass their lines under cover of the dark, but, finding an opening, I concluded to run for it. I expect to be obliged to return in an entirely different manner."

The officer was shown the magazine, the ordnance and the storehouse where the provisions were kept and given a statement of the amount of supplies on hand. He insisted that it be written on tissue paper and rolled in a little ball incased in wax in order that he might swallow it if in danger of being captured by the enemy. After inspecting the interior he went out to look at the defenses. To the surprise of every one, he began to mount the parapet.

"What are you doing?" cried the commanding officer. "Do you wish to be picked off by a rebel sharpshooter? These men are all hunters and could hit a squarrel on our ramparts, to say nothing of a man."

"Major," replied the officer, "I have been sent here to learn about this post in order that you may be supplied with what is required to defend it. Will you kindly inform me how I am to know what force you need unless I see the approaches?"

"But you will be killed."

"That, sir, is what a soldier is for—to be killed. He is to obey orders, and in a matter of danger is not to concern himself. I must see the lay of the land surrounding you. That I cannot do without exposing myself."

With that General Howe's aid added to the parapet. He had scarcely shown himself when a bullet sang by his ear. He paid no attention to it, walking slowly around the inclosure, every now and again a bullet being fired at him. One knocked off an epaulet, another pierced his hat. The men who in the inclosure looked at him with wonder.

"The bravest man I ever saw!" exclaimed one.

"Foolhardy!" cried another.

"He'll not escape much longer!" exclaimed a third.

The officer stopped at an angle which seemed to have arrested his attention, stooping down as if to get a clearer view of it. From it the ground sloped gently toward the enemy, but between him and them was a clump of trees. Then he arose, took out his handkerchief and blew his nose. The next moment he came down from the parapet.

"If there is anything about this fort," said the major commanding, "known to you I should like to know what it is. But you have taken a fearful chance for your life, and my wonderfully good fortune enables me to return with the information."

"I have still another gantlet to run," was the reply, "to get through the rebel lines with the information. That, however, does not trouble me. The general gave me my orders, and it is my duty to obey them. If I fail there are others to repeat the process and some one shall make known your requirements."

That night General Howe's aid sallied forth, declaring that he would get through the enemy's lines. In the early morning just before dawn the patriots made a dash for the fort, mounting the parapet at the angle where the inspector had blown his horn. He was with the storming party, and when the British officer who had commanded the fort saw him he cried in impotent rage:

"You cursed rebel, why didn't I hang you for a spy, as you deserved?"

"Because you didn't know I was a spy," was the cool reply.

Friends In Need.

"I don't put much faith in proverbs," said Brown to Jones. "For instance, look at the oft quoted one, 'A friend in need is a friend indeed.' Now, most of my experience with friends in need has been that they wanted to borrow. Give me the friends that are not in need."

The Other Way.

"When you don't want to leave footprints upon the sands of time?"

"Yes," answered the politician guardedly. "All I want is to cover up my tracks."—Louisville Courier-Journal.
