WASHINGTON TRAITS.

JOHN CLARK RIDPATH'S ESTIMATE OF HIS PERSON AND CHARACTER.

Personal Appearance, Physical Strength and Intellectual Powers of the Father of His Country—His Honesty and Sincerity, His Matchless Dignity Illustrated.

[Copyright, 1894, by American Press Association.]

It is difficult to realize such a man as the Father of His Country. He was so greatly mythologized by the admiration of his own times and the worship of the times following that the real man is obscured in the halo. The nimbus round about Washington is greater and more luminous than that of any other figure in modern history. He has been the idol of poets, philosophers and statesmen in all the continents. Byron summed it up in the concluding stanza of the "Ode to Napoleon Bonaparte:"

> Where can the weary ere repose
> When gazing on the great,
> Where neither guilty glory glows
> Nor despicable state?
> Yes, one—the first, the last, the best—
> The Cincinnatus of the west,
> Bequeathed the name of Washington,
> To make men blush, there was but one.

But Washington was real. Like other men, he had a bodily and personal life. He possessed peculiar mental faculties and a remarkable character. All of these may be weighed and estimated, not in the spirit of the myth, but in actual delineation.

In person the man Washington was strongly individual. Once seen, he was never forgotten. He was so shaped as to be distinguished from the common type. He was tall, even to majesty. His stature, however, was attributable to great length of body and not, as in the case of Lincoln, to long limbs. Lincoln's body was hardly beyond the average in length, but his legs were extraordinary. These features were reversed in Washington. His limbs were not greatly beyond the usual measure, but his body was very long, so that when he sat he towered above his cabinet. When he arose his height was still conspicuous, but not so strikingly shown as when he was sitting.

In his boyhood and youth Washington had extraordinary strength. Westmoreland county and the old Potomac towns still preserve traditions of the young man's feats. He was the greatest jumper in all the countryside. His strength of arm when in his vigor was tremendous. He is said to have thrown a stone across the Potomac opposite Georgetown, but the story may well be doubted. He was the best rider among all the young men in his part of Virginia. He mastered the horse with a skill and strength unmatched in his times. Even after the Revolution, on a certain occasion he took from his groom a refractory and cavorting horse that had thrown him, seized the animal, mastered him, mounted him and rode him, laughing immoderately at the discomfiture of the groom. His great strength was frequently exhibited when he as a youth was surveying on the upper Potomac, and particularly when he was sent by Dinwiddie to Fort Le Bœuf. He had great endurance in early life. Nothing could fatigue or exhaust him.

Washington's bodily vigor remained with him until the Revolution. He was 43 years old when he was appointed commander in chief. He was past 50 when relieved of responsibility. It was in this epoch that his constitution was shaken and undermined. It is probable that the responsibility of his situation preyed heavily upon him—at least he was broken by it. He became prematurely gray and partially bald. His elasticity of step and manner disappeared. He lost his teeth. The lines in his face were always deeply drawn, but during the Revolution they were furrowed still deeper, as if plowed into gutters with the share of sorrow. There was often a painful expression on his face, particularly about the mouth. This feature was intensified by the bungling attempt of a dentist to fit him with a set of artificial teeth. The work was not successful, and the dignified Washington was annoyed through the rest of his life with the deformity of his features.

In mind the young Washington, as well as the aged hero, was serene and severe. It appears from a diary which he kept when a boy that he never was a boy in instinct or manners. He was born a man. While still in his teens he was as sober and saturnine as most men are at 50. Only on occasion did he show some sign of humor. He never did or said humorous things himself. It might be difficult to discover a single joke that he ever perpetrated, but he was capable of appreciating a humorous situation and of laughing at it. The gleam, however, was only momentary; then the somber hue returned and settled on his visage and manner.

On the whole Washington was not a smart man. In his boyhood, though assiduous, he was not quick to learn. His intellect was rather strong, but at the same time somewhat sluggish and inert. This led him to be nearly always a little behind his countrymen in opinion and even in policy. This was particularly true in his relation with the democratic patriots by whom he was surrounded. These were nearly always vexed with his slowness and want of enthusiasm.

Washington's attainments were never vast or varied. They were not even large. His limited education was not re-enforced, as in the case of Lincoln, with intensive study. He was capable of serious thought and careful analysis, but the subject matter of his thinking was men and affairs—particularly affairs. He was able to judge and to measure, but not highly capable of learning. Of history and literature—even of politics—he knew but little. His mind did not, as did Napoleon's and Frederick's, sweep around great landscapes and rise to mountain heights. It did not flash with vivid gleam into the obscurities of unsolved things, but chose rather to brood patiently over common place and present aspects, deducing them from their meaning and value.

Washington's information also was always limited and was supplied mostly by the agency of others. He relied upon others rather than on his own diligence in gaining a knowledge of facts. Such was the nature of the man that he drew to him the most efficient help of many industrious and capable workers. They gathered around him with extreme fidelity and served him with affection and confidence. Some of these were older than himself in years. Not a few considered themselves more brilliant. Some thought themselves more ardent patriots. But such was the situation and such the personality of the leader that he commanded a great and faithful following among the ablest of his countrymen. In such cases it appears that society seeks and finds some average intellect capable of carrying out its mandates, and having found it flies thereto with all complaints and troubles and griefs, confident of obtaining the needed solution and rescue.

It was not the Washingtonian mind—that is, the intellectual ability—of the great first president that gave to him his fame and immortality. It was his character. The character of Washington is, without doubt, the most exemplary and high that we have known in our American annals. Aye, more: it is the test that is known in history. It is still easily first, even after the age of Lincoln. There is a certain wholeness and unsullied brightness about the public character of the Father of His Country that surpasses belief and realization. Here for more than a century the gaze of biographers, historians and critics has been fixed upon him, but they have found no blot or flaw—his character is absolutely flawless. His truthfulness was as invariable as the law of gravitation. It is strongly probable that as child and boy and man he never told an untruth in his life. It is also probable that this cannot be said of any other American.

His honesty was equally unassailable. Not the slightest touch of intrigue or double dealing has ever been discovered in the man from the first to the last. In one case he makes a charge against the government of £5, expended in sending a spy into the enemy's lines for information. For prudential reasons he makes the entry without giving the name of the person sent on the dangerous mission. After some time he forgot the name and could not recall it. At the bottom he says, after an asterisk: "This expense was incurred in sending a messenger into the enemy's lines. The name was not given lest he might be discovered. I deem it just, therefore, since I cannot recall the name, to charge the sum to myself." To this day the government of the United States is indebted to the heirs of Washington for the sum paid to his unknown spy.

Washington was as honest as he was truthful. Perhaps the two things go together. Perfect sincerity was also an ingredient in his character. In straightforward dealing the record does not show him ever to have deviated a hair's breadth from the perfect line. He seems never to have been once in his life engaged in a dubious transaction. In fact, by the time he reached his maturity his reputation for integrity was so well established and the severity of his manner so well known that none durst approach him with the suggestion of the doubtful thing.

The marvelous fact about this great character was, and is, that it enrounded itself with a sort of sacred circle within which no profane thing could enter. Corruption came not near him. All intrigue stood aloof and flew back from his countenance. Insincerity was driven away by the wind of his presence. There was something august, really magnificent, in the serene majesty of Washington's face and expression. He was looked upon with awe, not only by his intimate friends and the public men of the epoch, but by all the people. In the latter years of his life there was virtual unanimity with respect to the elevation, strength and perfection of his character. This is seen in particular of his public life, the record of which shows a completeness as singular as it is glorious.

Another marked attribute of Washington was his dignity. This was innate and was also developed by the vicissitudes and surroundings of his life. No other man of American birth has equaled him in dignity. His personal bearing was superb. Though by no means vain in anything, Washington was personally proud to a degree. So severe and unrelenting were his aspect and manner as to make him the most unapproachable figure of modern history. No man had the hardihood to approach him with freedom and familiarity. In his whole life he never had a friend who ventured upon familiar manners with him. He kept all aloof, not indeed of purpose and intent, but by the inborn and unrelenting severity of his countenance and pose.

As illustrative of the awe which Washington inspired and of the restraint which he enforced upon all in intercourse, the story may be repeated of the wager which was made and won among some high officials at one of the receptions of the first chief magistrate. It was in New York. The reception was on, and the guests were coming in. Washington stood after his dinner at one end of the hall. His expression was lofty and serene. Some members of the cabinet, military officers and others conversed in an animated way, referring to the matchless dignity of the president.

A dispute arose, and a wager of £5 was laid that Hamilton would not dare to indulge in an act of familiarity with the president. The secretary of the treasury, brilliant and audacious as he always was, was called up and informed of the wager. He hesitated to make the trial for those who had complimented him with the bet, but at length consented to do so. Shortly afterward, while all were watching him intently, he went forward to pay his compliments to Washington, laid his hand upon his shoulder familiarly and said, "My dear general, how well you are looking this evening!" The president, without a word or change of countenance, drew back and gave Hamilton a look—that was all. Shortly afterward, the secretary, returning to his friends, said, "I won your bet for you, but I would not try it again for £1,000."

Catarrh AND COLD IN THE HEAD relieved instantly by one application of Birney's Catarrh Powder

REV. FATHER CLARE, Pastor St. Ann's Church, of Cincinnati, Ohio, writes:

Gentlemen:—I cannot say enough for your Powder. It has cured me of an aggravated attack of catarrh which I had for many years, and which had resisted many other remedies. I shall recommend it to all my friends.

M. T. FERGUSON, Custodian U. S. Appraiser's Stores, Chicago, writes:

Gentlemen:—Do not almost entirely deaf. By a number of years I had suffered from catarrh, which finally settled in my head, which I could not get rid of by a regular cure. Hearing your Catarrh Powder, I tried it. Have continued its use for some time, and am happy to say it has cured me. I have recommended it to many of my friends and can say I have never heard of a case where it failed to cure.

The alarms are sounded upon the fower bells at Department headquarters by striking the number of the signal given to represent the fire, in this manner. If for box 15, four strokes (Fifteen and repeated; if for box 15, one stroke, a short pause, then three strokes, and repeated, thus, 1-111, 1-111, etc. "222" is sounded for all fires within the district bounded by Fifth, Ninth, Jackson and Quincy streets.

The signal for the police patrol, followed by the number of the station nearest the fire, is the SECOND ALARM—for a second fire.

THREE STROKES, followed by TWO, and repeated, is the GENERAL ALARM for a very dangerous fire, and calls out the entire department without detail of police.

TWO STROKES, slowly, indicates FIRE IN CITY. One long whistle from water works, for fire south of river. Three whistles from same, for fire north of river.
