HONOR DEAD HEROES OF VERA CRUZ

Most Impressive Funeral Pageant Since the Time of the Spanish-American War

BUSINESS GENERALLY SUSPENDED IN NEW YORK

Through Which Numbered More than a Million, of All Classes, Stood Shoulder to Shoulder in a Community of Grief, Along the Route of Cortege—President Wilson's Voice Shook With Emotion as He Pronounced Eulogy of the Men Who Lost Their Lives in Defense of Their Flag—17 Caissons Carried Bodies Through the Streets.

New York, May 11.—New York joined the nation today in memorializing the simple dignity, the heroism, the nobility of the nineteen blue-jackets and marines who gave their lives at Vera Cruz, at the most impressive funeral pageant since the time of the Spanish war started on its historic route from the Battery to the Brooklyn navy yard, it was as if the pulse of the city temporarily had stopped.

All business was suspended and over the commercial section of the city there fell a reverential hush. In the throngs which numbered more than a million, East Side and West Side peace advocates and war enthusiasts, native Americans and immigrants—stood shoulder to shoulder in a community of grief.

In the line of mourners that followed the artillery caissons bearing the dead were the chiefs of state and city government and many distinguished men of nearly every calling; but every eye in the throngs that lined the way turned first to the carriage where President Wilson rode, clad in the last funeral car. The president came from Washington during the night and was with the procession from the time he left the White House till the squad of marines fired their parting volleys over the flag-draped coffins at the Brooklyn navy yard.

The stand with the president at the navy yard were mothers, sisters and widows of the dead sailors and marines, but in the throng of mourners none seemed more deeply touched by the spirit of the day than the man whose word sent the navy to fight for their country's honor at Vera Cruz.

President Wilson's Grief. And to the president was left the privilege of reading the eulogy, and the nation's belief that those who died in the performance of duty had done for their country a service not to be measured by their individual deeds.

The feeling that is uppermost, he said, is one of grief, but there is mixed with that grief a profound pride that they should have given as they have given, and that it is just as hard to do your duty when men are sneering at you as when they are cheering you.

Picture of Vera Cruz. From a bird's-eye view, the multitude alighted along the route of the funeral cortege presented the picture of a vast human stream connecting two arms of the city. Muffled voices, soft spoken commands by military officers, the melancholy tolling of the Trinity church bell, emphasized a hush that had fallen over a city of noises.

The dead were laid by the tug Traffic and the caisson, early in the morning and lay in state in the Battery plaza for over an hour before the funeral procession started. The caisson was drawn by four teams of white horses, and the caisson was drawn by four teams of white horses, and the caisson was drawn by four teams of white horses.

Not a Suggestion of Disorder. Three thousand policemen, one every ten feet, held the crowd back on the sidewalks. For the entire cortege there was not a suggestion of disorder.

As the procession entered City Hall Plaza 509 children, near Mayor Mitchell, Mayor Mitchell briefly eulogized the dead and laid upon one of the caissons a huge wreath symbolizing the city's appreciation of the service rendered at Vera Cruz.

After this brief halt, the cortege resumed its measured progress to Manhattan. It was over this city and navy yard. The cortege that had characterized the eulogy in the business district gave way as the procession proceeded through the east side and Brooklyn to storms of applause. Here it seemed that the presence of the president eclipsed the grief of the occasion.

In the naval parade ground, the demonstration found a small physical compass. Less than 10,000 were able to follow the cortege, and the president and his staff were the only ones who stood the stand where stood the president with bare head. Mayor Mitchell followed by Secretary Daniels of the navy at his left.
