Fred Brown, who with George Burns made a successful break for liberty in Danielson on the morning of March 10, when they with a number of other bound-over prisoners were being taken from Brooklyn jail to the superior court in Putnam to answer to the charges against them, was captured in Brooklyn. Brown was captured Tuesday night in a motion picture theatre in Woonsocket, his home town. An inspector, who was accompanied by Jailer Albert S. Fields, made the arrest.

Brown, 19, was a very much surprised young man when he was handed on the trolley and told that he was wanted. He said afterwards that he felt quite secure in Woonsocket, as he was convinced that the Connecticut officers had given up the search for him.

On the way back to Danielson Brown told Jailer Fields the story of the escape. He and Burns were handcuffed together when they left the jail with the other prisoners and in charge of a number of deputy sheriffs. The pair were in connection with the breaking and entering of the Moseup railroad station and the Bellaville store in the same town. Brown is being held in a trolley car to be taken to Danielson, where a trolley car was to be boarded for Putnam. Burns managed to break out of the car on the way from Brooklyn to Danielson.

When they made the break to get away from the trolley car in Danielson their first fear was that they would be shot, but finding they had not been missed for the time being this fear passed away.
