The Teutonic allies continue successfully their operations against the Russians in northwest Russia and in Poland; an engagement to drive the remaining Russians from east Galicia has begun; the British have recaptured from the Germans in Belgium trenches taken from them recently through the use of flame projectors and have captured seven hundred yards of additional terrain there; French armies have bombarded Saarbrücken, in Rhineland Prussia to the northeast of Metz; the Italians and Austrians are still in heavy combat on the mountains, in the valleys and on the plains in the Austro-Italian battle ground.

BEIGIAN PAPERS FOUND BY GERMANS

A Series of Documents on Diplomatic Matters Which Germans Claim to Have

COMMENT OF VARIOUS BELGIAN DIPLOMATS

Regarding Alleged Political Conditions in England, France and Italy During the Years 1908 and 1909—Instatements Printed by the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Which Place Responsibility for War, on England, While Maintaining That Germany's Attitude Had Always Been Peaceful.

Berlin, Aug. 9.—(By wireless telegraph to Sayville, N. Y.)—The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung continues, according to the Overseas News Agency, to publish instatements of a series of documents purporting to be secret Belgian diplomatic reports found in Brussels by the Germans. The present instatement largely comprises comment attributed to various Belgian diplomats regarding alleged political conditions in England, France and Italy during the years 1908 and 1909, so far as the international relations of these countries were affected.

The Overseas News Agency in its summary of the documents continues: "Hostility of English Press.

"A certain kind of press known here under the name of yellow press is largely responsible for the hostile feeling between the two nations, but what could be expected of newspaper men like Mr. Harmsworth (now Lord Northcliffe), the editor of the Daily Graphic, the Daily Express, the Evening News and the Weekly Dispatch, who said in an interview to the Matin: 'The main weapon in the campaign of the English press, the newspaper says, is thus arranged by the Belgian minister at London, Count Lalain, on May 2, 1907.'

"The French have succeeded in convincing John Bull that they are his bitter enemies. England has hesitated long between Germany and France, but it always has valued the German character, while it finally feels contempt for the French. The German is a man of his word, while the French is a man of his tongue. Enough of France, which has neither courage nor political sense."

"The Belgian ministers," the Overseas News Agency continues, "in the documents found that Germany's intentions were peaceful. The Belgian minister at London, Count Lalain, said in an interview to the Matin: 'The German minister ought to know that a German attack even in the very remote future is actually impossible. On the contrary, Germany has everything to fear, since for centuries England has been accustomed to destroy the naval forces of foreign nations as soon as they arrived at a certain important position. After Holland, France has known this. Then came the turn of Denmark, whose ships were destroyed without the least provocation by Admiral Nelson after having entered the port of Copenhagen in 1801, the English press campaign. 'Stirs Up English Hatred.

"The Times leads in the campaign of calumny and defamation. Its Berlin correspondent has had the opportunity of obtaining better information, and it is to be regretted that the Times is not more candid in its statements, which he considered as stupid and highly obnoxious for both; but his long time in Berlin has led to the political ideas of his sovereign."

"The Belgian ambassador at Paris on October 8, 1908, declared that Russia intended to tear to pieces the Berlin treaty.

"The Belgian ambassador at Berlin, on Feb. 13, 1909, the political role of the king of England as follows: The king of England gives assurance that peace is dependent on the mercy of England. He has said always since the beginning of his successful diplomatic campaign, the leading instigator of the campaign is to isolate Germany, but everyone is aware that the peace of the world never has been more seriously threatened than at the present time by the king of England trying to secure it."

"This same ambassador, on March 21, 1909, characterized the state of public opinion in England as follows: 'The state of mind which prevailed in England reminds one of that in France from 1866 to 1870. France then believed it was her privilege to hinder Germany in the reconstruction of her unity, for the reason she considered this as a menace to the continental hegemony which France had enjoyed until that time.'

"The Belgian ambassador today regards it as an unfriendly act and a menace to peace if Germany refuses to enter, by contract, into an obligation to deter upon the mercy of England."

"Allied Treachery of Italy. The Belgian ambassador at Berlin, on April 17, 1909, thus characterized Italy: 'Italy has long been a friend of Germany, but no one in either Berlin or Vienna has indulged in illusions as to the probable assistance of Italy. The Italian government has never been consistent in its course toward France and England, and at the same time has been unscrupulously treacherous, clinging to the triple alliance, and is using this as a guarantee for the safety of its own position. Italy never has with limited confidence only. Italy reserves the right to side with the aggressor party, and has done so in the Oriental problem, where she finally joined Germany and Austria-Hungary after having played an uncertain part until it became apparent which side would be successful.'

"Under date of June 21, 1909, the Belgian ambassador at Berlin said: 'The triple alliance always has been considered in this spirit in Berlin because of his majesty Edward VIII conducted personally and with equal tenacity and success.'
