Flock of Wild Geese Seen Flying North—Many Birds Noted—Frank Edward Johnson Has Two Paintings on Exhibition.

Thursday and Friday bluebirds and bluejays were heard on Bear Hill and Saturday brought juncos close to the house in search of crumbs. This time a handsome small linnet was with them, the first of the season. A flock of wild geese were formed flying north in V shape was seen towards 7 o'clock Tuesday morning on the Scotland road. It is almost unheard of for wild geese to go north when ponds and rivers are frozen. The nuthatch and other winter birds that have been giving only one note now give repeated calls and are beginning to mate. The nuthatch is more often heard drumming and bird notes have changed as they do before the opening spring.

Medicine Hat and Saskatchewan and Pickawancee felt like close relations of Danielson, Mashnetuck and East Killingly Tuesday morning when the early clearers slipped out for a first peek at their thermometers. Of course there are thermometers and thermometers, but of them were telling in varying degrees, the story of the coldest morning of the winter as well as one of the coldest of many winters.

There were several points in the town where instruments were measuring the minimum of the zero in the son—20 degrees below zero. One of these places was at Young Brothers' yard on Mechanic street, another was at a farm in Williamsville, another in Mashnetuck. At East Killingly it was 15 below. Here in Danielson many readings were at 15 and 16 below and dozens of glasses showed 12 below. At homes where the reading showed 10 below there was a falling of the advantage one experiences in spending the winter at a tropical resort.

Nipped fingers, ears and noses were the lot of those who had early morning trips to make. Operatives going to their work in the big manufacturing plants felt the bitterness of the cold as they have not felt it before for years.

At the business hours of the day approached there came many calls for the services of plumbers. The intense cold had played with water systems in many buildings.
