The ex-governor, although he did not expect to speak, was so cordially greeted that as he said, he could not well refuse a few words of response to the people of Ashford there assembled. He spoke especially of the service rendered the state by many men sent into public life from the small country towns, and of the inestimable value of the lessons of industry and thrift taught by country life. He paid special compliment to the children who took part in the programme of the afternoon. He was given an ovation and at the close of the meeting many of those present spoke with him personally.

Judge Hinman in his address spoke of the great value of community associations as, in a measure, taking the place of the old time town meeting, and of the civic value of the get-together spirit. He gave instances of the advantages of modern facilities of communication which were making country life more attractive while retaining the rugged influences of close contact with the soil. At the close of his address he paid worthy tribute to the splendid record of Marcus H. Hokecomb as war governor of Connecticut.
