

DEMOCRATIC PRINCIPLES AND MEASURES.

A strict construction of the Constitution, and no assumption of doubtful powers. A Diplomat asking for nothing but what is clearly right and submitting to nothing wrong.

INDIANA STATE SEMI-WEEKLY.

[Volume IV Number 73.]

Indianapolis, January 20, 1849.

Black Hearted Villainy. We have just been furnished with the particulars of one of the most outrageous affairs that has ever come to our knowledge.

Some months ago, a young man of genteel appearance and polished manners visited Lowell and put up at the most fashionable hotel in that city, where he entered his name as Mr. Hale of New York.

Here by his suavity of manners and intimate acquaintance with the world—with life in the back woods as well as in the gay metropolis—in fact with everybody and every subject of general interest, he soon became quite a lion in the Manchester of America.

In the course of his repeated visits to the house of a highly respectable family, consisting of a retired merchant and his amiable wife, an only daughter, a beautiful girl of about 19 years, and one son doing business in the city.

It may be proper here to remark, that previous to Mr. Hale being so deeply smitten with the charms of Miss—, as to "pop the question" to her, he had ascertained that she had contemplated spending the approaching winter with a married brother residing in the vicinity of Milwaukee, Wis., and that she would be the bearer of a considerable amount of money to him.

On his return, after receiving the best wishes of his friends and acquaintances, left Lowell one lovely morning on their journey towards the far west.

On returning to Buffalo, after receiving the best wishes of his friends and acquaintances, left Lowell one lovely morning on their journey towards the far west.

At the suggestion of her friend and protector, the captain, she immediately wrote to her brother in Lowell, and detailed to him all the particulars connected with her unhappy situation.

At the suggestion of her friend and protector, the captain, she immediately wrote to her brother in Lowell, and detailed to him all the particulars connected with her unhappy situation.

under such circumstances was anything but agreeable—she who a fortnight previous was one of the gayest of the city, one whose hand had been solicited by young gentlemen of high standing, was now the abandoned wife of a felon, a fiend in human shape.

In due time, her brother arrived and in a great measure cheered up her drooping spirits; he refused to the noble hearted captain, who had so kindly treated her, the amount of expenses which had been incurred on her account.

The repacking of the trunks having been completed Mr. H. engaged a porter to carry his own trunks, and two belonging to his bride, (as she supposed) to the boat.

After the lapse of an hour or so without Mr. H. making his appearance, created some surprise, and the young wife and her friend started off to seek her truant husband, and failing to meet with him, the former became greatly alarmed fearing some mishap of a serious nature had occurred to him.

On leaving the steamer, Mrs. H.'s luggage, as well as that of her husband, was searched for, but could not be found, which circumstance caused fresh alarm to Mrs. H.; but the captain again pacified her by expressing his opinion that it was most probable that the baggage had been taken to the wrong place in Buffalo by mistake.

The following day a boat arrived from Buffalo, but no Mr. H. came passenger in her; on the subsequent day another boat came in, but still no Mr. H. nor any tidings respecting him.

The generous captain after hearing the young wife's story respecting the peculiarly unpleasant situation in which she had been placed, became satisfied that she had been made the victim of some daring villain and could not refrain from expressing his fears to that effect, at the same time offering to defray what expenses had been incurred at the hotel, and take the lady back to Buffalo from which place she could write home and apprise her friends of what had transpired.

On returning to Buffalo the captain of the steamer soon ascertained that Mr. H. instead of sending the trunks on board the boat as he had led his wife to believe, had caused them to be taken to the eastern railroad depot, and that the moment the boat had left the dock he had followed the baggage, and proceeded to Albany.

The young lady, on thus discovering that she had been the victim of a deep, designing villain, who had artfully contrived to rob her of a large sum of money and her ample stock of wearing apparel, and worse than all that, had blighted her prospects, her feelings became truly agonizing, and may be much better imagined than described.

At the suggestion of her friend and protector, the captain, she immediately wrote to her brother in Lowell, and detailed to him all the particulars connected with her unhappy situation; well knowing that he also would have placed the unbounded confidence in the honor and integrity of her husband; that he had first introduced him to her acquaintance and subsequently countenanced his visits and attentions to her.

"My love, we shall be on the lake to-night, you had better take out of your trunks such articles as you may be likely to have occasion for, so that the trunks can be stowed away in the baggage room during the passage."
