Turks and High Schools.

"I wasted," said an old Turk, "ten years of my life in one of the high schools. In consequence of this I know nothing. If I go to the school of the Sultan I might have become a great teacher. A high school teaches nothing that people want to know. For instance, they teach botany. They spend weeks in explaining to a young man that a rose is a rose! What earthly use is that to any one? If a man knows a rose when he sees it he knows it without having learned it in a book. If he does not know that it is a rose, no book will ever make him care to know what it is. In the schools never did good to anybody in this country." The Turk was partly right.

LOCATION OF BARNS.-Farmers often locate their barns on somewhat low land so that they will be out of the way of the prevailing winds, and consequently quite warm. ROMAN CRUELTY.

The games of the Roman Colosseum, which, according to Juvenal, had become as much a necessity of life to the people as their daily bread, supplies it with a most remarkable illustration of the particular phase of human nature. That in an advanced period of material civilization it should have been the case is a fact which is not only a disgrace to the human race, but a disgrace to the human race.

HIS IDEA.

HIS IDEA.-A hotel washman called upon us yesterday to tell us that he was going to China to live. He had been here nine years and had accumulated $5,000, which was enough to support him handsomely in the Orient. He was going to buy a wife with very small feet, and was going to keep her in first class style. He liked the United States, because it was a good place to make "heap money" in, but since the late agitation against coolie immigration he did not make much money, and he was afraid that "Mexican man kills me himself." When asked about his certificate for return, he said that he would sell it to "my cousin." "Maybe he will like some New-York." He wanted his interview put in print, and went away with a smile on his face like a slit in a watermelon. (Leno Journal.)

CHURCH BELLS IN ENGLAND.

London to-day acquires a new distinction. Its Cathedral church will boast the biggest bell in the kingdom, and one of the biggest in the world. Guide-books will give the fact due prominence, and tourists will pause, as the hours come around, to distinguish the solemn note in a babel of sounds. It cannot be said that till a quarter of a century ago Londoners missed the privilege, or wished the hours and royal deaths to be announced in louder thunder. They were generally under the impression that their own bell was a very big one, and a very fine one. Few of them, however, had heard the bourdons that do every day abroad, and that, we know not why, beat our own largest bells in the solemnity of their tones. They were also unacquainted with the history of St. Paul's bell, which is believed to be a recast of that over the old gateway at Westminster. In this country, too, the taste for bells has gone into an entirely different direction from that of the world. Christians are here generally called to service by chimes instead of the tolling of a single bell, as is usual abroad. Our chief use for bells is for bell-ringing, almost unknown abroad. To be sure, in Belgium all the great churches have carillons every hour, and in some cases every quarter-many every half-quarter. At Antwerp, Malines and Ghent it may be said the bells are always going, and at the first of these cities one may occasionally hear a long piece played on a hundred or more bells. But, upon the whole, the Continent tolls bells; we ring and chime them. The Reformation was the great point of divergence. At that time, and long after, the popular party in our parishes melted the big bells into smaller ones, converting peals of three into five or six; and, upon the whole, the big bell went out of favor. Popular feeling must have been against big bells, or, at least, against a shift, when Henry VIII. could stake and lose at a game of cards all the old bells of St. Paul's. There has long been a reaction. For a century our village church bells have been increased in weight as well as number, as a large proportion of our church towers testify by their shattered state. Parliament itself has contributed a great impulse to the change of feeling by handing the bells to the nation, and, and by trying to furnish it with a fitting peal of bells. It has unaccountably failed so far. Big Ben No. 1 having been condemned from the first, No. 2 having been found incapable of standing the blows of its own clapper. The reason of this is a mystery in which a wise man will not rashly intrude. Bell-founders stand on their honor, and resent any reflection on their skill or on the casting, as one well-known bell-founder has found to his cost. So we must have time to explain why these failures one does not hear of abroad, should be taken as almost a matter of course in this country. [London Times.]

GOOD WORK OR NONE.

It is a rule that a workman must follow his employer's orders, but no one has a right to make him do work discreditable to himself. Judge M., a well-known jurist, living near Cincinnati, loved to tell this anecdote of a young man who understood the risk of doing a shabby job, even when directed to. He had occasion to send to the village after a carpenter, and a sturdy young fellow appeared with his tools.

"I want this fence mended to keep out the cattle. There are some unplanned boards-use them. It is out of sight from the house, so you need not take time to make it a neat job. I will only pay you a dollar and a half."

The Judge then went to dinner, and the carpenter, gruffly, carefully measuring his work. When it was finished there was no part of the fence as thorough in finish.

"How much do you charge?" asked the Judge.

"I do," said the carpenter, gruffly, carefully measuring his work. When it was finished there was no part of the fence as thorough in finish.

"But I should have known it was there. And he took it and went away."

Ten years afterward the Judge had the contract to give for the building of several magnificent public buildings. There were many applicants among master builders, but the face of the Judge's eye was turned to a man of the fence, he said. "I knew we should have only good, genuine work from him. I gave him the contract, and it made a rich man of him."

It is a pity that boys are not taught in the earliest years that the highest success belongs only to the man, be a carpenter, farmer, author or artist, whose work is most sincerely and thoroughly done. [Living Age.]

A DOG MISER.

Instances of canine economy are by no means rare, but the case of a dog miser is, so far as our records extend, unique. Dan, the animal referred to, was a Newfoundland dog, belonging to a gentleman in Edinburgh. It frequently had money given to it, because, being a favorite, it was a sign of sagacity, it would go to the baker's and buy its own bread. But Dan received more money than his needs called for, and so he took to hoarding it. This his master discovered in consequence of the dog appearing one day with a breakfast roll when it was known that no one had given it any money. Suspicion aroused, search was made in the room where the dog slept. Dan appeared quite unconcerned until his bread was approached, when he seized the servant by her gown and tried to drag her away, and became so violent that his master had to hold him. Sevenpence-halfpenny was found hidden in the bed. Dan had thus hoarded his saving propensities even after this; but he exhibited a great dislike afterward for the servant who had discovered his hoard, and in the future was careful to select a different place of concealment. Stories of dogs who carry money to shops in order to obtain food are quite numerous; but the following incident, which was communicated to the Bristol Mercury, is, if authentic, probably unparalleled even in canine records: A Bristol dog was allowed to keep a certain butcher to receive his meat on trust, the butcher scoring each penny worth supplied on a board with a piece of chalk. One day our canine friend, observing the man make two marks with the chalk instead of one, seized another piece of meat, and, despite all the efforts of the butcher to detain him, ran off home with both pieces in his mouth. [Chambers' Journal.]

W. W. Seay, of Rome, Ga., has been experimenting in extracting sugar from watermelon. He has ascertained that they contain 7 per cent. of saccharine matter, or pure sugar, and that an acre of good land would produce 24,500 pounds of melon, from which 2,416 pounds of sugar could be extracted, worth, at 10 cents, $241.60.
