HOME AND ABROAD.

ever refused to allow the privilege of cremating their dead. In any and all circumstances the body must burn. Incineration is the inevitable. There are two, and only two processes, one is by more or less slowly incinerating in the foul tomb, by the chemical change effected by rotting is precisely the same as that accomplished by the application of heat, which is the second, the speedier and the more reasonable.

Dr. Gross, of Philadelphia, a most enlightened scientist and a physician of enviable reputation, lately died, leaving an order that his body should be disposed of by rational methods and not committed to the loathsome tomb of the grave. His example has had a marked good effect. When we speak of "burial" and "the grave," we mean at all times the conventional grave and the usual methods of burial—inclosure of the body in tight boxes of caskets. Far less respectful and more revolting is the method of the "burial" of the dead in the earth.

It will take care of decaying mortality in such cases; she will resolve it into dust speedily and with comparatively little repulsive-ness. The Union soldiers with the blue regalia of loyal devotion buttoned across their bosoms when they were laid in the naked trenches of the South and covered with the damp mold of mother earth were called "buried" and "buried" is a term which has a rich connotation of respect and reverence.
