IT GOES ON TO TELL THAT HAT DYEING, simple as it may seem, is a delicate and altogether a wonderful process. It requires long, practical experience, for almost every piece of felt has to be treated in a somewhat different manner. The key to success, however, is in having the original material perfectly CLEAN, or in time the dirt and oil will come to the surface, giving the Hat, after it had been worn in the sun a few times a "mottled" or "cloudy" look. This is why so many hats which look well when new, soon assume a rusty hue.

In a word, Hat Dyeing is an art which in all its details requires time, care and cleanliness—things which many manufacturers entirely overlook in their greed for greater profits. The only protection which the consumer has against such goods is in buying only reliable makes. But which are reliable and which are not? We admit the question is somewhat perplexing, and in a large measure the consumer must depend upon the judgment of the retail dealer. He knows all about the various makes, and if he is a conscientious dealer and cares for the future of his trade, will keep only reliable brands.

Let then those who would have the best satisfaction in their Hat wear select their Hatter right!

The May Shapes in Felts and Straws now ready.
