

GUITEAU!

at the horse's head, a squad of police marched down each side of the wagon. A large crowd had gathered around the Executive grounds...

Calm, quiet, peaceful Aspect of his countenance. His appearance was unassuming...

He turned his head and looked back at the crowd. He was looking at the people who were following him...

Further down the Avenue, as the crowd increased, the President's face became more and more pale...

Love for Their Stricken Chief. In nothing was this more observable than in the credible silence everywhere...

The Progress of the Train. As the train moved on, the President's face became more and more pale...

A Great Ride, Crete. The train reached Long Branch at 1:20 p. m. and the President was immediately carried to the Franchin Cottage...

The Interest About the White House. It was not natural that during the prostration of President Garfield...

Sympathy for Garfield was universal. There never was, perhaps, a man in public life whose fate was so generally watched...

THE NIGHT OF THE VERDICT. On January 20, 1882, the prisoner was convicted, the jury having been out only for a few minutes. The verdict was received with general satisfaction. Some of those who were present will ever forget the scene in the Criminal Court-room the night of the verdict of conviction was rendered. The dull, dark and dreary room was lit up by the faint flickering of a few tallow candles, that sent ghastly shadows dancing over the walls like so many demons summoned to gloat over the assassin's misery.

Attends to Evade the Sentence. During the interval between the sentence and execution, Guiteau made considerable money by the sale of his autograph and photograph, estimated at $2,000. With this money he engaged the services of Mr. Charles H. Guiteau, a well-known attorney, to defend him. Guiteau received a verdict with a demagogue that betokened acquiescence. He was stumped, as it were, temporarily by the jury, and he was obliged to plead guilty. He was sentenced to the State Prison for life.

Clamored for a Respite. Guiteau, but for science, his respite was refused. The President and the people believed that a humane and a fair trial, but that in all matters of doubt he should be given the benefit of the doubt. He was allowed to delay the trial for several weeks. He was finally executed on July 6, 1882.
