IDENTIFIED.

He was a handsome, grand looking man, unobtrusively and powerfully built, with blue eyes, keen and flashing as well tempered steel, which yet on occasion could melt with sweet, sunny beams.

Among miners from every state all quick witted and alert, the Texan held a proud pre-eminence in the astonishing readiness and dash with which they handled their shooting iron.

As by stress of circumstances, every man in a mining country is "on the shoot," it necessarily comes to pass, in this perilous state of things, that to obtain from his neighbors a high estimation of his moral and physical virtues a man and miner must display his opinion of his revolver.
