but from those who think they will be richer if the soldiers are not paid.

The pledge the southern soldier for his services are just as distinct and as clear and unmistakable as any pledge ever made to bondholders. There was no preacher in the pulpit, but told us with all the earnestness and eloquence he could command that the work of the soldier should never be forgotten. The platform speakers were equally as earnest and so were the newspapers.

General Alger, Ex-President Hayes and Other Distinguished Men Participate.

All parties agreed that they should be recognized and that the great statesmen whom Providence selected in 1863 in one of those wonderful messages which he read to the American people repeated and reiterated the same great truth. Nor has this sentiment changed since March 4, 1863.

The Nation's Obligations to Bondholder and Soldier the Theme of the Ex-President.

In thirteen states of this union there are state homes for soldiers. It is not quarreling with the state homes, but how can we do it, but we did not fight for state laws or state supremacy, but for the whole nation and the nation should reward and thank the soldiers. The state of Massachusetts has spent sixty millions for her old soldiers which ought to have been spent for the southern soldier.

Debts Which Can and Must be Paid—General Alger's Speech—Thousands Given Great Intellectual Treats at the Winfield Gathering—Educational and Religious Matters.

After patriotic songs and introductory patriotic address, General Alger was introduced by President Hayes, who presided in person. The following is a synopsis of the speech:

After doing justice to Kansas and the old veterans, he recognized in fitting terms the underlying principle of religion as presented so well in the work of the assembly. He had a wonderful faculty of interesting and entertaining the soldiers. In referring to engagements in the dark days he had all ways an anecdote to illustrate the circumstances. He spoke earnestly to the young people, reminding them that the history they read about the leaving of home and heartrending scenes from loved ones, and the very first day of scenes on the battle fields and he would like to know what money could be a recompense for an empty sleeve, a lost limb or a wrecked brain, and sympathy with those who were crying about the bankruptcy of the treasury.

The amount is paid to our own people and largely to the debt of the Government to foreigners who seek a market for their goods here. He believed the noble women who had helped in the great struggle would have a reasonable and just honor. To the young men, he spoke words of encouragement and he hoped they would be true to the support of the flag of their fathers and this government.

In closing he earnestly invited and urged his comrades to go to the national encampment at Boston and assured them of a good time. He also reminded them that nearly three quarters of the men who were in the army and navy during the war were now in the country, and urged them to join during the year. After thanking them for the magnificent reception he bid them good by.

A floral offering was sent to the platform for the most handsome gentleman, and he had no hesitation in accepting it, although he thought it hard upon President Hayes, Governor Anthony and Dr. Miller.

The Hon. Mr. Perdue was introduced as a Missouri man, not having been born in Missouri and being a citizen of Wyandotte county, he repelled the "soft impeachment" he was not in the war but considered it his duty to have ever offered to have helped in saving the union. Loyalty and nationality are the central points of the American people and the nation rests. Every soldier deserved the reward of his sacrifices and services. Speaking of the vast assemblage here and the work being done, he said that the results of the present session are known, there will be shown a great increase in the literacy of Kansas.

General A. M. Cook, of Leavenworth, commander of the Loyal Legion company of the state of Kansas, took off his cap to the commander-in-chief and ex-President Hayes, and said that he had no politics in either the G. A. R. or the Loyal Legion, but there must be a full measure of patriotism. A flag should not only wave on every school house, but on every church, and old soldiers should raise it in the morning and take it down at night. In his address he thought it very effective to sing "The Red, White and Blue; the Flag of the Constitution."

EX-PRESIDENT HAYES SPEAKS.

The distinguished visitors were dined at the Hamilton house and returned to the tabernacle in the grove, where they were jammed into and around the tabernacle to hear ex-President Hayes. He asked their attention to some fragments and files relating to the old soldiers and their country to the men on land and sea who saved the country in the time of danger. When war was ended, many of the twenty-five years ago, the country was placed under great obligations to a good many of its citizens. There were many difficult questions which the people offer to and statesmen were compelled to consider. The obligations were of two sources: First, the men who had risked life and property to save the country; second, those who had risked life and happiness and all they possessed in behalf of the country.

The first or moral obligation had to be first dealt with and it was a very important one. The debt was very large and it was drawing from 7.5 per cent interest to 10 per cent, which was a heavy burden. There were many good, patriotic men who said the great debt could not be paid; the great nations of the world never did pay their debts, and it was not necessary. Then there were those who said it could be paid, but they would let it be paid in paper. There was, however, a principal underlying the question. In the state of Ohio in 1875, we tried the question of whether we should keep our promise or pay in paper. My opponent in the race could make a very strong appeal to the people and he said that he would let it be paid in paper. He said the people wanted money, more money, and if I would ask him he said I would find out. But I did not let it be paid in paper, but I let it be paid in the nation was, it was strong enough and rich enough to be honest. I did not wish to hedge and haggle about the statistics, but I would let it be paid in paper to the creditors. Many of the old soldiers could not see why money was not good enough for the creditors. Although they seemed rather inclined to favor the greenbacks, they nearly all voted for me and I still go on arguing that they be paid their pensions in money that is as good as gold. We have paid twenty-four hundred million of interest and a thousand millions on the principal and there is so little left that we don't care much whether we pay it or not, and besides we can get our money cheaper than any nation on the face of the earth. I pay interest to bondholders and sometimes an individual. We are now three times as rich as we were a few years ago, and yet there are some people still saying we will bankrupt the treasury if the soldiers are paid. The loudest cry comes not from the poor people, who have to help pay the pensions.

The pledge the southern soldier for his services are just as distinct and as clear and unmistakable as any pledge ever made to bondholders. There was no preacher in the pulpit, but told us with all the earnestness and eloquence he could command that the work of the soldier should never be forgotten. The platform speakers were equally as earnest and so were the newspapers.
