more like than many young companions of mine forty years ago; very much, in fact, as I have almost forgotten all the great-though I know that over half a lifetime has passed by. But your father-tell me he has been at it, and the little old man began to get flidgety.

They relaxed their grasp of each other's hands and sat down together, while the others gave every attention.

"My father is dead," began the young man.

"What?" said the sire at his side.

"Yes, my father, and the companion of your younger days, is no more. He passed away four years ago, and on his dying bed he gave me the instructions I am now carrying out. It was the one wish of my father's latter life to be able to take the eastern trip to Rochester to meet the other two members of that party who have told of it was on his mind a great deal.

"When my father died he was one of the most prominent men on the Pacific slope. He had figured all the great political events since 1840 and occupied many positions of public worth. He was attracted toward California by the great gold panic, and had a very venturesome, yet not unpleasant, trip overland, for it was before the railroad came.

"He became so interested in the fisheries of the northern coast, and during a visit to those grounds was taken captive by a roving band of Indians and held for over a year. He finally succeeded in making his escape, but in the mountains for months; at last, and by the merest chance, getting to the coast again, and so on back to San Francisco. He became cashier in a bank, and while in this position married the daughter of the bank's president. It was not long after this before my father found himself president of the bank, which was the largest institution of its kind on the Pacific coast.

"It was then that my father began his public career, and he continued to rise in worldly station until his death came. I am now one of the officers of the bank of which my father was for years president. I have some numerous wealth, and with that father put aside for the time for the sole purpose of following out the wishes-I may almost say last wishes-of my father relative to this trip to Rochester and the hunting up of the other two of that original little party of forty years ago.
