Senator Ingalls will begin his second generation of service in the senate on March the fourth, 1894. A week or so after the results of the election are known, the funds, such as they are, will begin to develop.

The November number of the Forum contains articles on the first of three phases of agricultural depression. One is by Mr. C. Wood Davis, the Kansas student of our agricultural development, who, under the title of "The Probabilities of Agriculture," writes a reply to the former article.

It is stated that one of the parties in Pennsylvania expended $400,000 to elect its candidate for governor. Mr. Ingalls' declaration that the purification of politics is an iridescent dream may have been impolitic at the time he made it, but such evidence as that cited, it is hard to deny the truthfulness of it.

chester bullet. He killed several men with his fist. A law was passed declaring Bill's fist a deadly weapon. Old Tom and Bill had always been good companions. One day, however, they quarreled over a drink of the spoils of a plundering expedition. West struck at Starr, but the wily savage dodged the blow and at the same time landed a long bladed knife between the former's ribs. This was the tragic end of Bill West. At this time there was a reward of $2,000 offered by the Cherokee authorities for West's head and $500 for that of Starr. Old Tom was in need of a little ready cash and he determined to run the risk of losing his own head by trying to secure the smaller reward on that of his brother-in-law. So after killing West, Starr cut off his head, put it in a gunny sack and proceeded with it to Tahlequah, the capital, where he presented his charge to the chief, with the proof that it was the right head, and demanded the reward. The chief and treasurer were both feeble old men and they knew old Tom. They also knew that while the reward on West's head was only $2,000, the reward on old Tom's was $5,000. But Starr was ready for business, and at the moment of a dasher the Cherokee treasurer forked over the little $2,000 and the old terror departed with the money, to the delight and astonishment of the trembling people of Tahlequah, without killing a single person.
