MANY SORTS OF DRINKS. THE LATE GEN. BELKNAP'S KNOWLEDGE OF CHAMPAGNE.

Robert Graves, Discusses with the Gravity Becoming so Important a Subject, the Relative Merits and Prices of Beverages in Washington and New York.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 30.—The late Gen. W. W. Belknap was one of the best judges of champagne in the capital. He was a connoisseur in sparkling wines, and it is said could unerringly distinguish all the leading brands by a simple taste.

As a rule the men from the south are more likely to meet in public drinking places for a chat and a bout at story telling, and they are, moreover, about the brightest men to be found in such places.

That it happens that whisky is the fashionable drink in Washington, and there is no place in the country where one can find better whisky behind the public bars than here.

New York, I have observed, is the place to see champagne drinking. New Yorkers drink champagne as Washingtonians drink whisky.

But many others are rated men of business, and still more are lawyers in the town who think that in New York they must do as New Yorkers do, though perhaps they can't tell the difference by taste between poor sweet domestic and an extra dry imported.

There are men like the late Gen. Belknap, who rarely drink anything else in the way of intoxicants. Champagne has made a distinguished convert in the person of Senator Vest, the brilliant man from Missouri.

I suspect that this new penchant of Vest's comes from his intimate friendship with General Quay. It is an odd companionship this, but very warm one.

There is no man in Washington more fond of entertaining his friends at dinner than Senator Quay, and there is plenty of champagne for them whenever they call, whether by special invitation or not.

This Shoemaker saloon of which I have spoken is one of the interesting institutions of Washington. It is not only a famous resort of public men, whose names are known to every citizen, but it is a place where the most distinguished statesmen and generals and occasionally cabinet ministers may be found hobnobbing together.

If fact on the part of the management can prevent it no one will get drunk in this house, but if a man does become tipsy a carriage is called, and the luckless carouser is sent home at the expense of the owners of the saloon.

There is very little drunkenness in this place considering the large number of customers it has. Of course Shoemaker's is a gold mine. It is owned by a stock company, one of its shareholders being Joe Rickey, the well known St. Henry politician.
