Dominick O'Grady's Crime and His Present Condition. A Condensed Account of the Murder of Mary Gilmartin by the Unfrocked Priest—Followed His Victim from Ireland to America.

DOMINICK O'GRADY, the unfrocked priest from Ireland, who followed his sweet-heart, Miss Mary Gilmartin, to Cincinnati less than two years ago, and shot her to death on the street on Wednesday morning, April 25, 1894, is now dying from a complication of troubles at the City hospital in that city.

and drew the lines more closely around her privileges. The former priest smarted under the frequent restraints placed upon him by the young woman and her cousin, and it was not long before he began to make threats. These were passed as idle talk by his sweetheart, but O'Grady soon became so obnoxious that he was at last forbidden to come to the Tibbles' home at all, or in any other way attempt to see or communicate with Miss Gilmartin.

marked case. The public press and the Protestant pulpit have urged the authorities to at once proceed with the trial, but their appeals have been in vain. The Catholic church, it is alleged by some, has used its powerful influence in staying proceedings in the hope that something would come up to prevent the developments that might follow if the case went to a jury.

He rapidly advanced and soon became the bishop's warm friend. The O'Grady and Gilmartin families were near neighbors in Ireland, and when Miss Gilmartin was a mere child she found favor in the eyes of the young student. He was very devoted and attached to the young girl, and as she advanced in years his attention became more pronounced.

Her visit to Springfield was of short duration, and she went to join her brother, Father Michael Gilmartin, at Chicago. This was in October, 1893. While there O'Grady appeared upon the scene. The young lady's brother could not understand the close companionship of the two and he ordered his sister to return to Ireland. But O'Grady had a talk with his brother priest, and told him that he was going back, and assured him that nothing but the purest of sincere friendship had prompted his association with his sister. O'Grady then left for his native home.

Meantime the story had been circulated in Ireland that he had eloped with Miss Gilmartin. He had left his church without consent or without telling anyone where he was going, so when he returned he found his charge in the hands of another. His attempts to be reinstated were vigorous, but unsuccessful. Finding himself scorned by his people and disgraced by the action of the bishop, he again set sail for America.

He had been in constant communication with Miss Gilmartin all during his absence, and he knew exactly where to find her when he returned. He showed first in Philadelphia, and in some manner got acquainted with the management of a leading newspaper, who vainly attempted to get him a pastorate. Meantime Miss Gilmartin had come to Cincinnati and had secured employment with a local firm. O'Grady made his appearance there in the early part of 1894.

NICE ROOSTING PLACE

A Bee Lands on Mr. Lowy's Bald Spot and Has a Good Time. Right in the center of Justice of the Peace J. C. Lowy's head is a bald spot. It is one of the baldest spots anywhere in Jersey City. Mr. Lowy is very proud of it. He says it is the effect of the power of concentration of intellect. When he is deciding a case he rubs the spot for inspiration. The more rubs it the shiner it gets, and the shiner it gets the more inspiration the justice derives from it.

me has sunk was the second day of his imprisonment, when he was put upon the treadmill. The second day, Wilde, dazed and quiescent, was led out and put upon the treadmill. He had to take five minutes' rest, and began again. In the second fifteen minutes he stopped, threw up his arms, gave vent to a horrible scream of anguish, and fell in a swoon. The prison surgeon examined him and said his heart was in such a condition it would be dangerous to put him on the wheel again. So Wilde is allowed to sit in his cell. They throw in a quantity of oakum every morning, but he need not pick it unless he wishes to do so.

Open to Misconstruction. It was the funeral of a woman who left a husband and family, and naturally the minister's sympathies were aroused. He prayed for the mourners individually and collectively, for each child and for the husband especially, but a look of horror spread over the faces of the audience when he said: "And now, O Lord, we pray thee to raise up some one who shall take her place in this community and in church work."

How Oscar Wilde Spends His Time at Pentonville. He Is But Seldom Roused from the Dazed, Trance-Like Condition in Which He Remains Most of the Time—Tried on the Treadmill.

How Oscar Wilde bearing the strain of his new life as a convict in deary Pentonville prison is the question often asked nowadays by thousands over here who were edified or scandalized by his epigrams, said or written. So far there has been no authentic answer. It has come in the way of a London correspondent of the New York World to find out something about it that can be relied upon, as it comes from the best possible source. An interesting and, in one way terrible, story it makes. The cell into which he put him is very small, perfectly bare, made even more hideous by a rough coating of whitewash. There is a wretched hard bed and a table, with no cloth to cover the top of board top. On the table is the only literature permitted him—a copy of the Bible. He must read this or he may not read at all. He rises at 6 a. m., and before breakfast he must scan his cell, sweep it, make the bed, and in every way get into condition for the sharp eyes of the inspector. Then, at 7:30, he has breakfast. At 8:45 he goes to prayers, standing in the files with several hundred other convicts, and compelled to an attitude of reverence. At noon he has his two-course dinner, which varies regularly with the day of the week. At 6 p. m. he has supper, a daily repetition of the frugal breakfast. Between supper and bed he may meditate as he sits in his cell or he may read the Bible. At 8:30 p. m. lights must be out and every convict, including convict Wilde, must be stretched out in bed. There have been many stories that he has lost his mind. But the truth is he is still sane, but in a dazed, trance-like condition, from which he is seldom roused. The first time he showed any signs of a realization of the depth to which his activities. He is at the present moment engaged upon two or three important pieces of literary work, and it is quite possible that still others may have been begun and finished before his wonderful vitality shall have given out. Whatever estimate history may make of the nineteenth century, it is quite certain, says the Chicago Record, that the name of William Ewart Gladstone will be written high above his contemporaries for the measure of ability of the man. The versatility of his genius is almost incredible to the average mind, accustomed as it is to regard a man as great who does only one thing better than his fellows, without asking that he be at once statesman, author, financier, debater, lawmaker, business man, orator and scholar.

The great secret of Gladstone's wonderful success as a public man lies in the fact that the people have faith in him. Whatever his enemies may say—and they say many bitter things—the fact remains that the people of England believe in him as a man. Above and beyond all his brilliant qualities of mind is his sterling manhood, which the people not only of England but of the whole civilized world look upon with something more than admiration.

Thoughts Suggested by His Official Retirement from Politics. The retirement of Mr. Gladstone from public life is perhaps after all little more than a merely formal act. As long as he lives he will not cease to be a public man, whether in parliament or not, and his influence will be felt long after he is dead.

Just Erected by Order of the Dominion Government of Canada.
