Miss Virginia Brissac, leading lady of the World's Fair Stock Company, playing an extended engagement at the Opera House.

The first week of the engagement of the World's Fair Stock Company closes tonight with the last performance of the "Traveling Salesman," a good, clean comedy wherein each member of the company has been given an opportunity to display his talents. So real was the performance last night that two members of the audience almost forgot that they were watching a theatrical performance, and remarked upon the warmth of the costumes of the players. "I wonder why they wear those hot coats on this kind of a night," remarked a woman to her husband. "I'm sure I don't know," replied her spouse, "but you would think that they'd wear something light and cool."

John Wray is a great actor. So entirely does he forget himself in the character he is portraying that the recent accident in which he sustained a broken arm is for the time being forgotten by himself and likewise his audience. The bandaged arm does not prevent Wray from bringing out all there is in "The Traveling Salesman."

"The Gamblers," the drama to be staged the first half of the coming week, is one of Charles Klein's most successful efforts. The plot is wound around a recent money scandal that interested the whole world. Klein has endeavored to show that the prosecution of corporation lawyers is in reality persecution and his thieves who have successfully swindled banks out of large sums of money are made heroes while the lawyers and corporation heads have taken the shape of villains. "The Gamblers" has had a most successful run on the American stage and is still being featured in the large cities. Dramatic critics have gone so far as to say that it has eclipsed both "The Lion and the Mouse" and "The Third Degree," two of Klein's plays which held Honolulu audiences during the run they had when the World's Fair Stock Company played here last year.

Miss Brissac, known to be one of America's best gowned actresses, will wear some handsome costumes in the production of "The Gamblers."
