'MAN FRIDAY' BADLY HURT BY KALA FISH

"Man Friday" otherwise known as Kalaulaula, living on the lately (?) discovered and explored islet of Moku Manu, has met with a painful if not serious accident. Attempting to make captive a giant kala fish, Friday's left hand and arm were deeply cut. Though now suffering from the loss of a great amount of blood, he is recovering, it is said.

It was the sharp, blade-like tail of the kala which cut Kalaulaula. He caught it in a small net without knowing what manner of fish he had, and on reaching down to throw the fish to the shore, it slashed him many times with its tail. A party of fishermen were on the island at the time, and they rushed him to Libby, McNeal & Libby's cannery, where Dr. Tuttle was found. The latter dressed the cuts.

BALL TEAMS PLAY IN A THICK MIST; CROWD ONLY 20,523

[Associated Press Cable] PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Oct. 8.—The big crowd that went into the American league park today is estimated at 20,523, with receipts of $49,640. A heavy rain fell during the entire night, and for a time this morning it was a question whether or not Shibe Park would be fit for play. Groundkeepers worked over the soggy infield as soon as there was a let-up in the downpour, and at a comparatively early hour this morning it became known that the game would be played, provided the weather did not take a turn for the worse. When the crowd began to fill the unreserved section, the rain had changed to a thick mist, and this continued throughout the game, the conditions being anything but favorable for first-class baseball. Each team made two errors, the wet weather making it extremely hard to handle the ball accurately.

SHORTAGE OF FRESH EGGS; RUMOR SAYS HENS IN UNION

Honolulu is facing a fresh egg shortage. There is an abundance of the other kind, which, out of deference to their age will not be named here, but such eggs will probably not be used until the next campaign speeches are made. If the shortage grows worse it may be necessary to take to eating sea eggs, which are highly recommended by Mayor J. J. Fern.

A number of explanations have been tendered to account for the present shortage, but none of them seem to hit the mark. The chief one of the lot is that the hens are working together to boost up the prices of their output. This explanation is offered without consideration for the opinion of leading psychologists, who have stated that the hen has no commercial mind and is perfectly willing to scratch for a living throughout life.

The ones who favor the explanation given go on to argue that by such a combination to boost up the price of eggs a double advantage would accrue to the hens. In the first place, with eggs selling at a very high figure, consumers would be kept so broke buying them that they could never afford to blow themselves for a nice chicken dinner, and, again, the owner of a hen would be making so much coin out of her that it would be like killing the goose that lays the golden egg to sell her for the table. It is to be regretted that the psychologists said anything on the subject at all, for in their absence the explanation given would be perfectly satisfactory. But as they have firmly put it down in their books that hens are uncommercial minded, and have no sense of money values, it is impossible to do anything else than discard the proposition that the poultry have combined.

Still science, like the mayor, can explain anything if given time. It is only necessary to get the right branch of it lined up for the right answer to some particular problem. In this case, the psychologists failing, it is natural to turn from them to the evolutionists. As Charles Darwin, Ernest Haeckel, and a few other of the boys who have traced our life from the present writing to times some kind of half fish, have put it down as a pillar of their science that all life evolves, it may be not altogether impossible that the hen has done a little evolving on her own hook lately and gone out of the egg business.

Though neither Charley nor Ernest give much space in their treatises on evolution to the hen, and perhaps they do not even give her honorable mention, it is easy enough to imagine her in the times when humanity was represented in the nehu metamorphosis, strutting about in her suburban barnyard with a bunch of small sea chickens in tow, stopping now and then to pin down a nehu, to be divided among her hungry offspring, or making shift with a piece of seaweed to roost on for the night.

By conservative figures, figuring that the hen world did not exceed in number 5000, and that each hen did not eat more than three nehu a day, it is shown that she and her kind have reduced the number of human beings by millions, due to her appetite for nehu in the paleosolic period. It is also easy to imagine her, in the first faint dawn of living things on this sphere, beating it out of the sea, clucking as she proceeds for her children to follow her to the nearby farm house. She has kept on evolving, but from that time on her changes have been more gradual and less marked. Her usefulness has been increasing as time advanced, while other and smaller birds have been falling off in that respect. It was not so awfully long ago—though to be sure the exact year, and the particular place as well are not given by what histories there are on the subject—it was not so long ago that a king, who led a merry life, was tickled pink at a blackbird pie.

But that was before the hen came into her own. The king, were he alive today, would resent a blackbird pie and demand something in the way of chicken a la Roi for a repast. By all the signs of the times he would. In Honolulu alone in the neighborhood of 200 dozen chickens are eaten each month, while blackbirds would be quite safe here and unwanted on the table.

Chickens are eaten in countless ways, and the eggs are used in a number not less. Humanity has grown to depend upon them, and though the rooster no longer serves as an alarm clock, late and deplorable inventions having done him out of that function, the hens are constantly growing more indispensable, and without them even now our life would not be worth the living. In that way she has us at her mercy. When our lineal descendants were nehu, they were also at the mercy of the hens; and though the circumstances in the two cases differ, in both it is a question of life and death.

And here comes in another possible explanation to throw light on the egg shortage. Suppose the hens, along with her children, and children's children, her maid-servants and man-servants, is getting ready to march haughtily out of the barnyard, not for any commercial purpose, mind you—psychological research goes against that idea—but simply to start life on a new and independent footing and spare their necks from the chopping block and their eggs from breakfasting humanity. Man might not starve to death, but it would reduce him to a depth of despair where he would see in death more of a carress than a sting. No eggs, no chickens.

That is why the seriousness of the egg shortage has caused some uneasiness. If the hen has evolved out of the laying business, she would at least still be fit for the table, and the mayor's advice could be followed and sea eggs used. The evolution theory is the one which can be accepted with the least pain. The other—that she is going to desert the barnyard and either commit harikari, or become wild—is the worst. There may be other explanations, but the last one given is bad enough. Fancy a race of hens, not to speak of the roosters, ending their lives in lonely places, or again, fancy them all becoming wild and uncatchable, while tables in homes and cafes bewail their absence.

There is something doing in hen circles, so speak with absolute certainty and give the reason why they are shutting down on egg producing is impossible at this time, but it is more than likely that one of the explanations given is true.
