There were surprising results to which certain Paris music lovers recently allowed themselves to be subjected, says the Springfield Republican. A number of violins of various ages and values, including a Stradivarius that had been sold for $15,000, were played in a darkened room, so that the experts might judge the tone quality of each without predispositions. The instrument that was voted to be of the finest tone was made this year in Belgium. The second place was awarded to a French instrument of 1911, and the Stradivarius came third. This evidently means that the violin-making industry is as efficient today as in the days of Mr. "Strad."
