exact, what penalties the conquered will have to pay. It is certain that if with her allies France should be victorious, she will demand the return of Alsace and Lorraine. Beyond that, territorial change can hardly be assumed. But what will be the political changes? If Russia should be the beaten side, is there in her great practicality dumb people enough of the spirit that loves liberty to prompt them to demand it through the substitution for absolutism of real representative government? The people of Germany are as intelligent as any in the world. They know what liberty is, although they have seemed to be entirely content with a military government that makes them subject at all times to the instant call to arms to fight some foe, not their own, who stands in the way of their peace policy. Germany is hard beset. Her great navy and her splendid army may now save her from defeat. Would that make a difference with the German people? Would they then form the resolve to take the business of governing themselves into their own hands? Would they take their place with the English, the French, and the people of the United States, or would they go on tolerating the imperial and the divine right ideas? There is a strong probability that the Austro-Hungarian Empire, under defeat, would fall to pieces, and the Hapsburg dynasty might come to its end in the ruin.

"It is all a rather daring speculation, but the assumption is sound and certain—that Europe will not see firm, assured, and lasting peace until the outworn dynastic system shall give place to government of, by and for the people, whose treaties will be not for the property of thrones but for the development of industry and commerce. That change, if it comes, will be one of the compensations of the war."
