

The Miner.

UNKINDNESS.

Unkindness breathes a bitter tone,
A keen and deadly blast,
That turns warm hearts to hearts of stone
And leads to crime at last.
It chills the soul—the beaming eye
Grows dim beneath its breath;
It damps the smile, it feeds the sigh,
Breeds misery and death.

It turns to dark and fearful hate!
The fond and loving breast,
Unmarked oft casts its poison forth,
Or veiled "neath smiles and jest,
Reproves it gives where praise was sought,
And frowns when wood to smile;
Unkindness adds its gall,
With everything that's vile.

How many erring sons of earth
Are yearning to do good,
If tended was their latent worth,
If kindness by them stood!
But no—to crushed and bleeding hearts
Unkindness adds its gall,
And propagates the seeds of crime
Inherent in us all.

The Philosophy of Living.

He who works a stated number of hours daily, for a stated price, and who regularly receives his wages and lives within his income, is said to be the most independent man in the world. With his tools he lays aside his care, and in his family or with his friends spends a happy life—with nothing whatever to perplex him, and every thing to give content. This is one view of the matter, and it is probably entertained by those who are wearied and perplexed with the cares and responsibilities of superintending a large business, or conducting intricate operations. People are always inclined to imagine any other position better, in some respects, than their own. The happy man above described envies his employer, and wishes that instead of being the mere agent, bound to move at another's direction, he could change places with his principal. For he knows his own embarrassments and cares, and if he has not the burden of the direction of great affairs, he has the daily anxiety of contriving how he shall make a stated sum to meet unexpected exigencies. It may be a daily puzzle to him to keep down the demands of pride or necessity. He has, moreover, the contingencies of business to fear, as well as his employer; for if the principal is unsuccessful the employed suffers; and may on any day receive notice that his services are no longer required. And as to dismissing all care and thought about his employer's interest, if he can do that, he is precisely the person whose labor can be easily dispensed with. The service of no man so purely mercenary is worth much.

True independence, as far as one can be independent, is accessible to both employers and employed. The secret is, to undertake no more than can be managed, and to determine that you will have hours of relaxation when you can dismiss the cares of business from your thoughts. As poor Richard has it, "Drive your business, and not let your business drive you." In eager competition, men give themselves too little rest and undertake too much. Some one asked an English statesman and jurist how he could get through the amount of labor which he performed. "As a thief gets through a horse-pond," was the answer—"I am dragged through it." There is too much of this "dragging," both among the English and among ourselves. Sometimes men make solid gains, and secure wealth when too much fatigued to enjoy it. But too often they make shipwreck. Hudson, the English projector, whose popular designation a few years ago was "the railway king," is now so reduced in pocket that his friends are raising a subscription to purchase a small annuity for him, that his life may not close in absolute penury. The true philosophy is to regard life as a thing to be pushed moderately, and enjoyed as it passes. It never should be treated as too many do, as a great game of hazard. Nor should we fancy that all in which we are interested depends entirely upon ourselves. Other people, it must be conceded, can do something. The best business results are obtained by finding out worthy people and confiding in them. The experiment of entire direction on a great scale has been tried by the Emperor of the French, certainly one of the strongest men that the world has seen, but he is beginning to learn that one man is not competent for everything; and he, we suspect, may envy the contented laborer, who has only to do his daily work and receive his daily wages. There are thousands like him. Their empires are narrower, but their experience is the same; to-day, success; to-morrow, disappointment.—Ez.

A WELL-INFORMED editor says the reason why Chicago did not fall within the line of the total eclipse was because the Lord did not care to trust that city so long in the dark.

The devil seems to have got into the negro preachers of Alabama of late. Rev. Peter Goode, of Montgomery, Rev. Henry Morgan, of Demopolis, and Rev. Henry Jackson, of Summerfield, are all charged with rapes, or attempts to commit rape, on the persons of negro children.
