

THE ROSE BUD.

This bud, by summer's ripening breath, May prove a beautiful flower.

Address

OF THE EDITOR OF THE "ROSE BUD" ON COMPLETING THE FIRST NUMBER.

Now, dear friends, that our work is done, We here present you number one. 'Tis but a small sprig of a rose, On which not even a bud yet grows. That it is late, full well we know, And yet, we trust, 'mid frost and snow, With goose-quill's care and strict attention, And many arts we need not mention, To keep our "Bud" from being blighted, 'E'en when the winter fires are lighted. But there's one thing that we will mention, If you will please to pay attention, You will not find upon our pages The musty lore of by-gone ages; Not even, to please our anxious mothers, Will we presume to flinch from others, To make them think their hopeful daughters Are going to make such mighty authors. So, if you'll just excuse the blunders Which shall appear in our first numbers, We may, perhaps, in future days, Present you with some warbler lays. Ottawa, Aug. 1843.

Revenge.

AN HISTORICAL FRAGMENT.

Come with me, gentle reader, let us roll back the wheels of time some twelve hundred years, and, sooner even than one of our famed steamships cross the briny ocean, we will alight in merry England.—The sun was just sinking beneath the billows which lave the shores, and its rays still lingered upon the lofty towers of Otgar Castle and threw a flickering light on the scenery around, now blending every object in harmony, and anon revealing a long chain of dark green hills, and, in the bright summer days, one could easily descry the glittering form of cascades and waterfalls which come gurgling down in the still evening, mingling with the sweet music of the waves as they beat upon the beach with unwavering precision. The castle itself was an ancient edifice of Gothic architecture, situated on an eminence which overlooked the surrounding country, and, with its massive walls of grey stone, seemed like a sentinel watching, with jealous eyes, the movements of its neighbors; for, at the period of which I speak, war and rapine were almost the sole business of the inhabitants. But, on this evening, the moon rose so calm and lovely, and its beams fell so gently around, that one could scarce believe it had ever witnessed aught sinful. The light was sufficient to reveal the forms of two females standing in the entrance of a ruined temple, engaged in earnest conversation.

"Do you think, my daughter," said the eldest, "can you, for a moment, imagine that a descendant of the earls of Otgar—no, too, who has swayed the sceptre of England, will fly, like the low born, from her enemies? No; if I have merited death, I will abide the result."

"But," interposed the daughter, in tones of gentle remonstrance, "your life is dearer to me than my own. I would die for you, but cannot live without you. Go with me, dear mother, and we will seek an asylum where, safe from every enemy, we can live for each other."

"Nay, my child," said the other, "press me not. The hand of death is already upon me, and I am here to discharge a painful duty—to tell my child the mother she adores is unworthy of her love—the hand she presses is stained with blood! Yes, it is true; Elfrida, the once pure and innocent Elfrida, is a murderer! Though you regard me with horror, the time was, Emma, when I was worthy of your love. Turn not from me, for I would warn you by my experience, before I leave you forever. I wedded the murderer of your father, not for his throne, but for vengeance. By the aid of a powerful drug, I laid him in the grave, and this dagger drank the life blood of his son. My desires for revenge were gratified, but I have found that the paths of sin are paths of bitterness. Years of unavailing repentance have passed since the commission of that awful deed, and now that suspicion is awakened, I have employed the same means to place myself beyond the reach of justice."

Elfrida ceased speaking. The full moon shined on her face showed that the spirit had fled. Her hand still grasped the poniard, and her dark hair hung in beautiful curls around her face and neck, but the light of her eyes had fled, and her once dazzling features wore the pale hue of death.

Thus perished England's once haughty queen. The particulars of her history are doubtless familiar to all. But there was one placed in the sepulchre by her side who, though not mentioned in history, was worthy of a better fate. We allude to the unfortunate Emma, who, though she could not boast as much beauty as her mother, possessed all the great and amiable qualities which adorn the sex. She never recovered from the shock she received in the death of her mother, and was soon placed by the side of her who had broken the cords which bound her pure spirit to the world.

Oh, how important it is that we improve our precious time. It is given to us that we may make good use of it, and, if we neglect to do so while we are young, when we are older, we shall feel sorry we were not more industrious in trying to get knowledge. And when we have a few leisure moments, we should employ them in visiting the sick and helping the poor and afflicted, if it is in our power. We ought to be thankful for the many comforts we enjoy, and improve them by making good use of our time. P. C. Ottawa, July, 1843.

To Farmers & Wool Growers.

The subscriber would respectfully inform the farmers and wool growers of the country, that they are prepared and will manufacture good clean wool into cloth in lots of one hundred pounds and upwards, for one half as taken from the loom, with additional charges for dressing the same, (which shall be reasonable).

They will also exchange cloth for wool in lots of less, or more than one hundred pounds, on fair and reasonable terms; and will work wool on commission at a fair price for cash.

WOOL CARDING done for customers as usual for 45 cents per pound. They have put their machine in good repair, and assure those who bring their wool in good order, that their work shall be well done.

The farmers will find it to their interest to have their wool well washed, both for carding and for manufacturing, as wool in a bad state will invariably lose from 25 to 33, and as high as 50, per cent; it is also desirable that wool for manufacturing be done up in separate fleeces.

The goods we intend to manufacture will be filled cloth, cassimere, satinett, jeans, flannels and blankets of full width. J. & D. GREEN. Dayton, Ill., April 29, 1842. 49—tf.
