THE REPORT OF THE NEW ORLEANS GRAND JURY.

The report of the New Orleans Grand Jury upon the New Orleans tragedy has been made. It is a long but not uninteresting report. The jury failed to indict any of the rioters. We never entertained the belief that it would. Though the jury, in common with all New Orleans, well knew who incited the mob gathering, who led it and who boasted of being its promoters and leaders, it retreats before the plea that it is impossible to identify any particular person who shot and killed any particular prisoner.

This is all bad for good government. It is an open confession of the inoperative character of the law in New Orleans. Indeed, the Grand Jury report not only expresses no regret for invasion of the law, but excuses and apologizes the outrage upon it. In short, in so many words it declares that the people rose superior to the law and meted out justice. The philosophy of all this masking of mob violence and apologizing for the riot is too apparent to need elucidation. If it is to obtain much footing, the social structure in the United States will not be able to withstand it, while as for the laws, they will become but convenient means to be used when wanted and set aside by mob force, whenever a sufficient number of men can be inflamed by designing leaders.

The report of the jury so far as the mobbing of the prisoners is concerned will shame the United States before the world. It will be pointed out as a flat confession of the ineffectiveness of the executive character of our system, and we will have no reply to make to the rebukes that will be pronounced. At least the jurors might have put upon record their condemnation of mob methods. They have seen fit, however, to give them their approval in the particular case in hand.

Concerning the alleged bribing of the jurors who tried the murderers of Hennessey, the jury declares that there is evidence sufficient to justify the moral conviction that the petit jury was bribed; that it was brought from a division of six to six verdicts of mistrial and acquittal by corrupt means, employed by the O'Malley private detective agency. But the jurors say that they cannot find sufficient evidence upon which to base legal conviction. Hence no one is indicted for bribery, but true bills are brought in for attempts to bribe talesmen.

The expression of the jury is studiously emphatic and repetitive that the processes of the law were trifled with and interrupted by vicious men hired in the interests of the prisoners. It declares that so subtle were the operations of these agents for the murderers of Hennessey, that the list of talesmen as drawn by the court from among whom the trial jurors were selected, was put into the hands of the defendants' detectives before it was declared in open court, and in the face of the court order that the list was to be kept secret until a given day. In brief, the Grand Jurors find that there existed in New Orleans a secret detective agency under the pay of the Mafia that the courts could not cope with, and that trifled with their records at will, bribed talesmen, intimidated jurors, corrupted witnesses and officials, and engaged in blackmail, perjury and jury-fixing with unblinking freedom.

As to the murdered Italians, the jury finds that nine were citizens, or had formally declared their intention to become citizens and had renounced allegiance to the King of Italy. The two others were subjects of the King. It finds that all of them would have been convicted had justice been done, and then it proceeds under oath to declare that the secret organization, the "Mafia," does exist in New Orleans; that during many years it has dealt in human blood, and been guilty of extortion, murder and a host of "blood-curdling crimes." The majority of its membership are pronounced to be refugees from Italian justice, outlaws and reprobates, upon the heads of some of whom a price is set. The jury adds that in the office of the Italian Consul at New Orleans there is a record of 1,100 Sicilian and Italian criminals who have been landed at that port during several years past, and that written opposite the name of each is the story of his crime in the district from which he fled. The jurors then, with perfect frankness, for the second time approve the means employed by the mob to break up the Mafia, adding that it must be destroyed; that the law is powerless so long as Mafia agents are able to corrupt witnesses and tamper with juries, and that hence "it is the duty of the people in the exercise of their sovereign right to issue their decree of condemnation."

It is altogether a remarkable official document; the first which we can recall that openly apologizes for and advises mob violence, and confesses that a small band of the lawless is superior to the whole people of an American State, and able to paralyze their efforts to maintain orderly government. For so much of fact as the report sets forth, it is valuable; but even that record is rendered somewhat doubtful by the industry manifest in excusing the mob and in massing testimony in support of its action. For so much of the report as fails to condemn lawless methods in dealing with prisoners tried under the law and entitled to its protection, the American people will blush. However much they may feel that the people of New Orleans were moved by great provocation, however they may abhor the Mafia and rejoice in its breaking up, they must reflect that apology for the method chosen, from the mouth of the chief inquisition provided by the law for the protection of life and property, is a dangerous precedent, and one that may visit upon us greater evils than even the villainous schemes of the Mafia and the corrupt practices of the private detective agency.

If such reports are to receive approval, we will cut loose from the only safe anchorage we have--the law--and our communities will become subject to the decrees of passion and the assault of mobs, which, where moving in an apparent right direction once, are impelled a score of times wrongly and in antagonism to human rights and constitutional guarantees.

A MISERABLE BLUNDER.

One of the worst features of the mismanagement of the entertainment in San Francisco of the President of the United States, was the partisan reception by the Union League Club. When the invitation of that club was put upon the programme, a partisan color was given to the reception of the President in the metropolis. When the President accepted the invitation, he ceased to be President of the United States and became President of the Republican party, for the club is purely a Republican organization.

Now the President came to the coast as the Chief Executive of the Nation. His speeches all along the route of his approach showed that he was making a tour as President of the Union, not as a partisan. He frequently referred to the fact that party division was, and should be lost sight of in Americanism, and that he recognized party only as a means to the ascertainment of the wishes of the people upon certain great questions of policy. The rule of the reception by the club was that no Democrat should be present; that none but members of the club should attend, and hence, that no person of differing politics should be permitted at the reception, since only Republicans can become members of the organization.

In order that this partisan and unseemly action might be taken a whole day was consumed by a wretched little party organization that might graciously have been accorded to Oakland, Stockton or Sacramento. The President was required to double upon his course, run up to Sacramento, hasten away on his return to San Francisco, and dash through Oakland in order that a purely partisan coterie might give him a purely partisan reception.

For this piece of insufferable stupidity and bad taste Wendell Easton is more directly responsible than any other person. The fortune of club politics has made him President of the club, and the egotism and assurance of the man made him offensively prominent in the general management of the reception by the metropolis. The President is not himself to blame for the affair. He was a stranger in a strange land and had very little opportunity indeed to pass in cool judgment upon the propriety of anything proposed. He found everything mapped out for him with an assurance that was nothing short of stupefying. He was in the hands of the committee and could ill afford to make a scene by upsetting any of the committee's programme. But whether he reflected or not, the action of the club, to which it was no doubt moved by Easton, was offensive; that it should have been proposed at all was in execrable taste, to put it in the mildest possible form.

The whole affair was on a par with the San Francisco management of the entire reception of the President, which ignored the interior of the State, was stupidly oblivious of the feelings and sentiments of the people of California, and became so inflated with its own importance that it swelled to offensive proportions. The truth is, San Francisco sorely needs that men in its midst of some discernment, good breeding and refined taste, should be put at the head of affairs of every kind in which the city is called upon to act, in a representative capacity. It sorely needs men to be brought out and to the front, who will save that city from losing the little remaining sympathy and respect of the people of the interior of California for the metropolis.

As things long have been, and still are managed in San Francisco, she is subjected to the judgment that the metropolis is wholly selfish, often brutally insensitive of the rights of others, and that she is cutting loose from all relations with the State at large, except the slender ones that commerce maintains. For it is not of necessity that the interior shall be in large degree dependent upon San Francisco. Nor is it in the order of natural and human things that the people of the State outside of San Francisco shall submitively suffer under contemptuous treatment by the people of the metropolis.

We are aware that the recent hogghishness manifest in the reception of the President and the absorption of his time has created a great deal of bitter feeling, and we are not prepared to rebuke it, since it is the natural and inevitable outcome of a long series of insults put upon the people who are so fortunate as not to reside in San Francisco, by the presumptuous, self-appointed leaders who assume a metropolitan importance they are not capacitated by nature or breeding to maintain.

It is unfortunate and deplorable that this should be so, but there is not one of the country press, not an interior community, not a merchant outside of San Francisco, not a social or other organization or circle beyond the limits of the San Francisco peninsula, that is not fully aware of the fact, and that has not had reason to be painfully conscious of it.

Let it be hoped that there will be a change; that the better sentiment of San Francisco's population will work revolution and reform, and that the cordial mutuality and loyal friendship that should exist between the interior and the metropolis will be established. But the people of San Francisco will not enjoy the satisfaction of witnessing such establishment of relations, kindness and mutual helpfulness, so long as present conduct is indulged in. There must cease to be manifest the disposition to absorb all things; to treat the interior as only a tolerated necessity; to indulge in constant petty spiteful opposition to interior cities and towns, and their enterprises. There must be an end of jealousy on the part of the metropolis that would disgrace a border village; and, above all, San Francisco must, in all public concerns, put thoughtful, considerate and far-seeing men to the front when she does honor to strangers; men whose horizon of view of State importance is not bounded and circumscribed by the narrow limits of their own city, but whose comprehension of the State embraces its whole area, and whose conception of California citizenship ignores the people of no section.
