

SUSPICIOUS CHARACTERS.

Two Men Who May Have Been Evans and Sontag.

A Young Sacramento's Unpleasant Experience in the Country a Couple of Weeks Ago.

George Karcher has just returned from a several days' unaccountable absence...

The day was warm, and Karcher was very thirsty. Seeing a pair of horses and a light vehicle hitched by the old man...

Two rough-looking men came to the door, and, after eyeing the young Sacramento closely, told him they could give him a drink of coffee...

One of them handed Karcher a tin cup filled with coffee, and he was about to raise it to his lips when he turned round and asked the men if they could tell him where Lincoln Schoolhouse was...

That settled it. As Karcher turned toward the man one of the lads of his coat was moved to one side, partially disclosing a gold star on his breast...

He was not even allowed to drink the cup of coffee, but was told to get into his buggy and travel, and not to look back if he didn't want to...

Karcher did not need a second warning, but "got up and goes" as speedily as possible. Some hours later he passed by the same place again, but the men and the star disappeared...

Karcher completed his task of distributing election tickets and returned to the city. He related his experience to his father, and the veteran politician became impressed with the idea that the men might have been Evans and Sontag...

Whoever they may have been, one thing seems certain, and that is they have no use for anyone wearing an officer's badge of authority.

At the Metropolitan Theater this evening Alexander Salvini will appear, supported by a fine company, in D'Enery's five-act comedy drama, "The Three Guardsmen," from Dumas' famous romance...

Whoever they may have been, one thing seems certain, and that is they have no use for anyone wearing an officer's badge of authority.

It appears, however, that it was the other victim of the garrottes—the man who was killed at Second and K streets, a few minutes later...

As the three garrottes were crossing K street toward the Frat building they met a man hastening in the opposite direction...

As they passed him on the crosswalk one of the trio dealt him a fierce blow in the stomach with his fist, which doubled the man up and checked his apparent desire to interfere in the case.

No further arrests have been made, but Monaghan remains in jail. It will be remembered that four men were seen to leave the scene of the first garrotting on Third street and hasten toward Second...

This fact, taken in connection with Monaghan's being found near the latter, doubtless caused his arrest.

THE KARAKORAN MOUNTAINS.

W. M. Conway's Account of His Ascent of the Pioneer Peak.

Thrilling and Interesting Description of a Perilous Journey in the Karakoran Mountains.

The following is an extract from W. M. Conway's letter to the London Geographical Society, describing his ascent of the Pioneer Peak in the Karakoran Mountains of Cashmir.

"At length, on the 25th of August, we assaulted our peak. Bruce and the Goorkhas called us at 1:30 A. M., and all seven of us had to crowd into the one tent till it should be time to start. They were all fairly numb when they arrived, and we now knew by experience that, at this altitude, none of us could stand the cold of night for more than an hour. Hence we did not start till 7 A. M. A series of sleepless nights, culminating in this last, rendered McCormick unable to march, so we had to regretfully leave him behind.

"A quarter of an hour's walk brought us to the first point on the ridge, about 1,200 feet above the camp. Here we had to set up the barometer and take some photographs. Beyond the first point there was a small depression, which had to be reached by a rather difficult scramble. On either hand steep slopes, or walls of ice, descended to the glaciers below, and we were obliged to keep to the very crest of the ridge, and our climbing-irons were of the greatest assistance for the rocks were all fissured with little cracks, which would have been greatly increased by the weight of our heavy packs. Here we made our most secure anchorage for the steel points of our claws. Beyond the little col which we reached in about ten minutes, the ridge rose to a rather more precipitous slope, and presented to us a very steep face of mingled ice and rocks, which had to be ascended by the aid of our climbing-irons and the aid of the Goorkhas, who were of the greatest assistance for the rocks were all fissured with little cracks, which would have been greatly increased by the weight of our heavy packs.

"The ice beneath us, in any case, too hard for the steel points to penetrate until it had been prepared by a stroke or two of the ax. Small steps were cut for us, but if we had been without climbing-irons, large ones would have been necessary for safety; our work would have been greatly retarded, and our rate of progress much diminished. As it was, however, progress continued. The work of step-cutting—severe at any time—far more fatiguing than at the ordinary Swiss levels. From the top of our rock scramble to the second peak took us an hour and ten minutes. We were rewarded when we got there by finding under a kindly rock a little pool of clear water more precious to us than all the veins of ore that traverse our mountain in every direction. A marvellous cure of our mountain sickness at this point, and had to be left behind.

"The remainder of our ascent was altogether uneventful. The wind blew straight up before us and had to be followed. It was of ice thinly covered with snow, and every step had to be cut with the ax. The snow was very heavy and corniced on our left hand, so that we were forced to keep well on to the right slope, and remained in ignorance of the development of the view in the other direction. Our advance was necessarily slow, and the terrible heat which the burning rays of the sun poured upon our heads did not add to our rapidity. There was a gust of air upon the corniced ridge where we could not go, and now and again a puff would come down upon us and quicken us into a little run. The wind, however, was in the midst of utter aerial stagnation, which made existence intolerable. Such conditions dull the observing faculties. I heard the click-click of climbing-irons making the long, sliding steps, and mechanically struggled from one to another. I was dimly conscious of the vast depth below on the right filled with tortured glacier and girding schramms. But now and again would come a reactionary and grandeur of the scenery would make itself felt. We could look over the three passes at the head of the serene glacier, and behold mountain masses of extraordinary grandeur showing above them. At length the slope we were climbing became less steep, and with a few more steps we stood, at 2:45 P. M., on the ground of the third peak on the ridge, at an altitude of about 25,000 feet.

"Here a surprise awaited us. The Golden Throne's summit was still 1,000 feet above us, but the peak we were on was less than 25,000 feet more than that. We named it Pioneer Peak. Unfortunately, the broad extended arms of the Golden Throne shut out much of the distant panorama from our side, and a grand snow pyramid of over 2,000 feet on the other also intercepted the view to the south, though its own noble aspect was compensation enough. But framed in the passes I have mentioned there were glorious mountain pictures, that to the south, looking straight down, that the Golden Throne's summit was still 1,000 feet above us, but the peak we were on was less than 25,000 feet more than that.

"But the moments were precious, and we used the best advantage. The sickness of two of the Goorkhas reduced the number of instruments that could be carried, and I greatly lamented the absence of a little theodolite, whose place was ingeniously supplied by a primitive compass and a clinometer. With these I took a round of angles. I next photographed the panorama twice round. Then the turn of the glacier came, and I was able to sketch in an important addition to the glacier survey. Meantime the barometer had been accommodating its temperature to the air, and was indicating 54° Fahr. It stood at 13,300 ft., and yet we felt no insufficiency in the supply of oxygen, and Zurbriggen was able to smoke a cigar in the middle of the day. Zurbriggen's pulse and mine, made itself apparent in the working world, but our hearts were being sorely tried, and mine was particularly bad state. We had all nearly reached the summit, and we were all weakened, not so much by the work of the day, but by the continued strain of the day's work. There was no debate about what we should do next. We all knew that the greatest work of the day was now done, and that henceforward nothing remained for us but downward and homeward."
