

SHE MAY BE TALKING YET.

Mrs. Junius is Given Some Information About the North Pole.

"The principal thing about the north pole," began Mr. Junius, as he heaped his wife to toast, "is—"

And then he stopped and reached for the sugar bowl.

"Well, there!" cried Mrs. Junius, laying down her fork. "If you ain't the provokingest creature, Julius Junius! Always beginning a sentence, and then, just when I have dropped everything and am waiting for the rest of it, you go off on the cream pitcher or the sugar bowl; though how in the world you can afford three lumps I don't see, with me slaving and slaving trying to save something, so that when we get old, and come to die, we shall have a little laid by to live on. But that's just like a man, and so I told mother in my very last letter, which I suppose you forgot to mail; and now she won't get that recipe in time for the church sociable, and she'll blame me for it. But, for mercy's sake, Julius Junius, are you going to sit there all night like a dumb man, eating toast, and not finish a single sentence? Why don't you go on, and not keep me waiting, and say what the principal thing about the north pole is?"

As his wife whistled for brakes, Mr. Junius took another mouthful of toast, with great deliberation.

"It's the ice," he said, in gentle tone.

And when he came in with the kindlings his wife hadn't got half-way to her first semicolon.—New York World.
