

EVIDENCE OF PROSPERITY

WHICH FOLLOWS THE ELECTION OF MAJOR M'KINLEY.

A General Revival of Business in All Manufacturing Industries.

DES MOINES (Ia.), Nov. 11.—The announcement was made to-day that as a result of the election of McKinley a contract has been closed between the Des Moines Union Railroad on one hand and the Chicago Great Western, Wabash, Chicago and Northwestern Des Moines, Northern and Western and Chicago Milwaukee and St. Paul roads, by which the local company is to build a $200,000 union depot on Cherry street, between Fifth and Seventh, next spring. The Des Moines Union Railroad will also build extensive shops, and the Great Western will build a big freight depot, to cost $50,000.

IN EVIDENCE AT CLEVELAND. CLEVELAND, Nov. 11.—Seventeen important manufacturing establishments here to-day gave evidence of the prosperity following the election by either starting up or putting more men to work. The Britton Rolling Mill, which works have been idle for one year, to-day set a force of men at work oiling the machinery preparatory to starting the mill with 100 men next week.

The United Salt Company's works has set business going with a force of 234 men working on full time. The American Wire Company, one of the largest concerns of its kind in the United States, started up full blast to-day. A double turn is run night and day. Twelve hundred men are now working and more hands are wanted.

The Hoffman Bicycle Company is again running. Many of the men who lost employment by the shutting down of this establishment were given their old places to-day.

Superintendent W. S. Judd of the Avery Stamping Company said to-day that business had increased 15 per cent. at the office within a week. Fifteen new men were put on to-day, making ninety already employed. The full force of the factory is 150 men.

The Cleveland Twist Drill Company has increased its working hours from eight to ten a day.

A BOOM AT SPRINGFIELD. SPRINGFIELD, Nov. 11.—The Slattery Plov Works, which have been idle for two months, have resumed operations with seventy-five of the 200 employes at work. The Wabash Railroad shops, which have been running with half a force, began running with the full force this week.

Charles Ridgley, President of the Springfield Iron Company, states that it is very indefinite when the rolling mills, which give employment to 600 to 800 men, and which closed May 1st, will again open.

The watch factory, which has only employed 150 hands for some time, will not increase the force for some time at least.

MILLIONS OF GOLD. NEW YORK, Nov. 11.—Conservative estimates made by bank officials of the total amount of gold received so far by the banks since election day put the aggregate at from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. Several packages of money have been received from points West. The banks believe that the premium for New York exchange at Chicago will lead to large receipts of currency in a few days. Another thing which aroused comment was the news of the sale since election day of a block of $4,000,000 of the United States 4 per cent. bonds by the Bank of England.

DAVENPORT (Ia.), Nov. 10.—Things are resuming a rosy hue in business circles here. The Bettendorf Wheel Works and other manufacturing have increased their forces of men. The Knosman & Peterson Furniture Factory started up with a full force of men Monday.

Monday morning the Rock Island Plov Company resumed work, after lying idle all summer, with 200 men at work.

Most of the machine shops and farm implement manufacturing in Moline started up in full blast Monday, and where file men could be found by hundreds during the summer it is hard to find a single one now.

NEWARK (N. J.), Nov. 10.—Business revivals are growing here. The Warwick-Stockton Company, makers of bicycle parts, has increased its force by 150 men to serve surplus orders. The Heller Brothers' file works at Forest Hill, which had been closed for a year, opened today with a larger force than when shut down, and will run overtime. Winters & Nies, manufacturers of horse collars, have doubled their force.

Cheese and Courtship.

Aristocrats in different places and ages have prided themselves on many different things. One of the queerest, perhaps, is the aristocracy according to cheeses, which, according to the "Neuve Zurich Zeitung," prevails among the patricians of Zermatt. The aristocracy of families is valued by the number and size of the houses whose names are made at the time of the French revolution.

When a child is born, a cheese is manufactured, which is then called by the name of the child. It is partly eaten when its namesake gets married, each wedding-guest taking a portion. The cheese is then put away again, and finally cut into and finished at the funeral of the person whose name it bears.

When a young man weds a maiden, he gets to be allowed to dine with her family on a Sunday. His offer being accepted, the lovers wait anxiously to see whether the girl's father will cause the cheese to be set on the table. At the end of the long meal, if all goes well, the master of the house solemnly fetches the cheese bearing the would-be bride's name, sets it on the table, cuts it, and gives a slice to the young couple. When they have eaten it, they are betrothed pair. The others at the table partake of the cheese and drink to the eternal friendship of the two families.—London Daily News.

Can be Flarried for Nothing.

The great Hungarian exhibition at Buda-Pesth offers many attractions to the sightseer, and one at least which has never been thought of in connection with any previous exhibition—the opportunity to be married, or to see somebody else married, free of cost. A town hall has been erected in the portion of the exhibition grounds which represents a Hungarian village, and this building has a very important raised by the clergy supported by members of the imperial family, a real marriage register will be opened in this town hall, and at fixed dates three times a month any betrothed couple may be married according to the civil ceremony, in the exhibition grounds, and have their names booked in this register. The committee invites them with all their friends to a week's feasting, and furnishes them with carriages, horses, food and sleeping-rooms. These weddings will give the visitors to the exhibition a perfect idea of the customs in all parts of the country, and they will make the scenes of the village street pictures of real life on high festival days.—Westminster Gazette.

The New Version.

New York Editor—See here! don't you know executions by electricity are the law now?

New Man—Certainly.

"Then, sir, what do you mean by using this old time, chestnutty, mouldy quotation, 'Give a rogue rope enough and he will hang himself.' What do you mean, sir? We are not living in the middle ages."

"What substitute would you suggest?"

"Say, 'Let a rogue go on shocking society, and he will get shocked himself.'"

BANKER BENSON'S DOUBLE.

The greatest stroke of luck which ever befell me in the course of my eventful and in some respects unbrilliant career was my extraordinary resemblance in face and figure to Mr. Benson, manager of the Tinford branch of the London and Tinford Bank.

Ted was waiting for me at the lodgings he had taken in a small street near the river. "Halloo, mate," he cried when I entered, "what's up? You look happy."

"Happy!" I echoed. "Look here, Ted, I've just hit upon what may turn out the most splendid bit of luck we've ever chanced upon, old pal." And then I told him as briefly as possible of my meeting in the train with the manager of the bank, who was as like me as one penny to another.

For a moment he seemed astonished, and then said slowly: "Well, supposing there is this wonderful likeness between you and him; how is it going to help us?"

"Ted," I said, "you're a fool." He moved uneasily.

"Business that," he cried, "and come to think of it, it's one to tell me I'm a fool and another to show this resemblance is going to bring business."

"You're not as cute as I thought you, lad," I remarked. "Don't you see my drift? What should you say if I told you that one of these fine mornings I meant to take the manager's place in the bank parlor and to play the very deuce with the bank's transactions?"

He still looked at me dubiously. "I can't see," he said, pursing his lips, "what good you can do at that game. You're as ignorant of the bank's business as a kid."

"Just so," I replied, "but I don't intend to be always in that condition. Now, listen to my plan. I want you to one of the subordinate bank officials. Find out when they are sending a large consignment of bullion somewhere. Then I shall make my move. I shall take the manager's place, ask for the delivery note of the stuff, tell the clerk that I have been instructed from headquarters to have it forwarded to another destination and finally give him a place we will arrange between ourselves as the address to which the bullion is to go."

He began to look more cheerful. "Not a bad idea," he said sulkily; "but it will take a lot of doing."

Left alone, I went to my bag and proceeded to make up. I may say without vanity that I have some ability in this branch of the actor's profession, and very soon I had transformed myself from a dark complexioned young citizen of 35 to a venerable-looking citizen of, say 70 years or more. So complete was the disguise that Ted, coming in two hours later, started.

"Beg pardon, sir," he cried; "what can I do for you?"

"In the Queen's name I arrest you, Edward Marsden." I cried, assuming the manner of a detective.

He turned very white. Evidently he thought his time had come at last. Seeing his distress, I threw off the wig and other disguises and cried: "Buck up, old man; the Queen doesn't want you just yet."

He tried to laugh, but I could see that he was trembling like a leaf. But it gratified me to think how completely my "make-up" had imposed upon him, for now I had nothing to fear when I made my call on the manager.

"Well, what luck?" I asked my mate when he had recovered from the shock I had given him.

"Not much, but something to go on with," he made reply. "I watched one or two of the bank chaps go into the little bar opposite the bank, and of course, I followed them in. One of them seemed a soft sort of fellow, and I at once made up to him by asking if he could tell me what had won the Chester Cup. He told me at once, and as he seemed to be a bit of a sport I got talking on race matters, asking him for tips and so on.

He appeared flattered by my reliance on what he said, and we had various whiskeys together. I didn't breathe a word to him about the bank, of course. That'll come later. Now, I have arranged to meet him at a billiard saloon to-night, where by filling him with whiskey and getting on the right side of him I may, perhaps, be able to get hold of something worth knowing."

"A very good start, indeed," I commented. "I couldn't have done the thing better myself."

At 11 o'clock the next morning I was ushered into Mr. Benson's room in the bank. He rose courteously to greet me.

"Good morning, sir," he said, briskly. "What can I have the pleasure of doing for you?"

I at once confided to him some imaginary details of an account which I wished to open with the bank. I forgot now what I said, for I was intent all the time on watching him closely, so as to be able to imitate any little peculiarities of expression or manner he possessed when the time came.

I noticed that he wore in his coat an orchid.

I made mental note that I, too, would decorate myself in this fashion. Then, again, he appeared somewhat deaf, and had a manner of putting his hand on his ear when listening to you. This, too, I carefully noted for reproduction.

In the course of our interview he rang several times for the young man who appeared to be his confidential clerk. This man's name was Mostyn. Fearing that with so many details to remember I might forget so slight a thing as a name, I made note of Mr. Mostyn's on my shirt cuff.

At length I had got together a nice little collection of data, and I accordingly took my leave. The interview had been a great success, and I got all that I wanted.

A week passed without my trusty mate eliciting anything of value from the sportive youth whose acquaintance he had made. But at the end of that time he came to me and said:

"Governor, I reckon it's about time for us to make our haul. I've learned from young Barrer that the bank will be sending £100,000 worth of bullion to Walker's of Edinburgh the day after to-morrow."

Then there is not a moment to be lost," I replied. "Go at once to Edinburgh and take an office there in the commercial part of the town. Call yourself Morrison, Jenkins & Co., and wire me your address. I'll have the bullion consigned there. The moment you get it leave the place and get across the Atlantic by one of the vessels sailing from Glasgow. I'll join you in the old crib in New York. You understand?"

"Right you are," he said promptly. "We shook hands and he was off."

On the following morning, as Mr. Benson was on his way home from the theater, he was seized, drugged and bound, and conveyed to our room. In this manner the coast was left clear for me to play my part.

Next morning I turned up at the bank as the manager of the institution. In the faultless frock coat I wore an orchid and a seal, the counterpart of that worn by Mr. Benson, dangled from my watch chain. Artistically my dress and make-up were beyond reproach.

At the same time I must confess I felt a kind of tremor as I entered the little room and sat down. Suppose something should go wrong in the course of the day. So many things might occur to give me away. And then there dawned on me the thought that immediately I had dispatched my that I might leave the bank on a pretext of illness. Of course, why had I not thought of this before?

I rang the bell. The office messenger entered. "Send Mostyn here," I said, watching him closely to see if he detected anything strange in his "boss."

"Yes, sir," he said, and left the room. Mostyn entered. He gave me a respectful "good-morning," and then awaited my instructions.

"Mostyn," I said hastily, "I'm feeling rather unwell this morning and shall get home when I've signed anything urgent. There's nothing special, is there?"

"No, sir, except that consignment for Walker & Co."

"Oh, yes, of course," I answered. "Bring me the delivery note. By the way, Mostyn, I've had instructions that the bullion is not to go to Walker's, but to Morrison, Jenkins & Co."

"All right, sir," he answered carelessly.

He went out to bring the delivery note for signature. And then a feeling of horror shivered through me, for I remembered that I had been idiot enough to overlook entirely the fact that I had never seen Benson's signature. Here was a nice mess to be in.

But in a moment I saw my way out of the trouble. Ringing the bell, I told the messenger to bring the current letter book. Here I found scores of Benson's autographs, and with a little practice I contrived to arrive at a fairly good imitation of it.

Mostyn brought the note and asked me how he should fill it in.

"To Morrison, Jenkins & Co., 28 Queen street, Edinburgh," I replied, without hesitation, reading from a telegram I had in my hand.

He rapidly entered the address given and gave me the slip for signature. I signed it boldly and returned it to him.

"There is nothing else of importance, sir," he said, "the other things I can attend to."

"Very good," I replied. "Then I'll be
