WEAK.

The first thing weak men do is to get downhearted. You must not do that. Your only chance is to ask help. You can find it. If you are listless and timid you want to be braced up. You want to become a full man again—a great man and a powerful man. "Hudyan" is the only thing that can make you as vigorous as you once were.

A FEMINE RESOLVE.

Characters—Mrs. Walter Lee and Mrs. George Rivers. Time—Midmorning. Mrs. Lee (doubtfully, above the clank of the hansom, which is taking them westward—It's really frightfully nice of you, dear, to give your morning to my concerns in this way.

Mrs. Rivers—What nonsense, when you know that there's nothing I love better than choosing other people's clothes regardless of other people's expense.

Mrs. Lee—Oh, but it mustn't be regarded of expense in my case—for heaven's sake! How should I face Walter if I shopped on those principles?

Mrs. Rivers—My dear, the Walters recover from these little shocks, I find. And a cheap hat is a social disgrace which no man could wish to bring upon his wife.

Mrs. Lee—I am, really. The hat I've got on was four guineas, and it's been weighing on my conscience like lead ever since I got it—in a moment of abandonment.

Mrs. Rivers—It certainly doesn't weigh on your head. Perfect dream of a hat, my dear, and worth anything.

Mrs. Lee—Oh, please don't condone it. Scold me for it. I'm not going beyond two guineas on any account at this time, and should prefer something at one guinea, if possible, to not a millionaires, like you, remember, and it really is naughty to spend great sums on personal decoration when the East End—

Mrs. Rivers (laughing)—All right, dear, I'll suppress you to the best of my abilities. Only don't blame me if you're a failure for the rest of the season. Here we are (as hansom pulls up at a hat palace in Regent street). Now, this is half my cap (feels determinedly in purse).

Mrs. Lee—Nonsense! It's entirely my cap, and no one else's. You shall not—(feels convulsively for her purse).

Mrs. Rivers—I go shares or go home—you may choose, dear. (They wrangle amiably on the pavement and end in mutual vows of postal orders).

Mrs. Lee (the first symptoms of the hat fever dawning in her eye)—Now, then, we may as well look in at the window first. How do you like that toque with the hyacinths and red violets?

Mrs. Rivers—Too old for you by ten years, ma mie. That Gainsborough with the early Victorian crown is more dans votre type.

Mrs. Lee—Oh! but the one with the strawberries, Edith. That's my hat. Mrs. Rivers (solemnly)—Mary, it's divine! You were made for it! Don't hesitate.

Mrs. Lee (the symptoms visibly aggravated)—Could I hesitate? It's my hat—unless, of course, it's too expensive. Come along!

(They enter. A Superior Young Person of superb figure and quivering eyebrow sweeps up to know their pleasure).

Mrs. Lee (airily, determined to show no awe in the presence of a friend)—Oh, I just wanted to see that hat with the strawberries, in the window, please.

Superior Young Person—Certainly, madam (pronounce "maram"). This way, if you please.

Mrs. Lee (in a whisper)—We'll look around before deciding, in any case. (Superior Person waves them on to red velvet seats and disappears. They look around with excessive outward calm).

Mrs. Lee—There are charming things, but nothing to touch mine. Mrs. Rivers—Oh, yours already. That's quirkily settled. Then we needn't—

Mrs. Lee—Oh, don't you tease. I know it'll be too dear. Here it comes. (Pummles with hat pins and veil.) Superior Young Person—Allow me, madam.

Mrs. Lee (feeling bitter reproach to her manners and general station in life)—Thanks.

Superior Young Person (placing hat at correct angle of fashionable discomfort, and handling mirror with dignity)—This you will like that, madam. Suits you perfectly. One of our latest model hats.

Mrs. Lee (diplomatically casual)—Yes, it's not bad. A little large, perhaps. How much did you say?

Superior Young Person (laughingly)—Four and a half guineas, madam.

Mrs. Lee (with a drawn smile)—Oh, dear! How very ruinous! Rather too large for me, isn't it Edith?

Mrs. Rivers (manfully)—A trifle large, and very ruinous. Superior Young Person (weary and unmoved)—Of course, we only use the best materials. But if you wish to see something inexpensive—

Mrs. Rivers (courageously)—You'll want to see some others before deciding. In any case, won't you, dear? Try this one.

She tries quantities, all found wanting. Superior Young Person's interest flags more and more. During one of her absences:

Mrs. Lee (pale and weakening)—It's no good, Edith. There's only one that I don't look a fright in—and it's too dear. Do help me. Couldn't I bargain?

Mrs. Rivers (cruelly)—I'm afraid they won't reduce it to 2 guineas, dear.

Mrs. Lee (wincing)—No, of course not!—but 3 or 3½—(sees something badly suppressed in other's eye, and leaves it).

Superior Young Person (returning with fresh ammunition)—How do you like this, madam? Two guineas. Just for morning wear, or country—

Mrs. Lee (inwardly conning excuses for the fall which she now feels to be inevitable)—Thanks, no. I think I'll try the one with the strawberries once more.

Superior Young Person (more cheerfully, seeing land at last)—Certainly, madam. I know this one would give you satisfaction. So very stylish, is it not?

Mrs. Rivers (plunging nobly)—It certainly does suit you, dear, but four and a half seems an absurd price for what it is. What is your last price, now?

Superior Young Person (coldly)—I can't inquire, madam. (Goes in search of Mr. Homebody).

Mrs. Lee (desperately)—What am I to do, dear, if they won't reduce it? Mrs. Rivers—Leave it to me now. I'll be doggedly determined.
