

JUDGE GRESHAM'S CANDIDACY.

The current issue of Harper's Weekly contains a fine full-page portrait of Judge Gresham, accompanying which is a carefully prepared and discriminating biographical sketch, which closes with the following significant paragraph, after referring to the contest between Gen. Harrison and Judge Gresham's friends in Indiana: "If Indiana should present a united delegation for General Gresham it is far from improbable that the President will have a candidate for whom the people will present strong inducements to all members of the party for zealous support."

From another point of view this declaration is significant. It is in effect an additional tribute to the high character, wide popularity and unquestioned ability of Judge Gresham. Since his name was mentioned as a candidate for the Presidency there has been but one expression of opinion as to his qualifications among Republicans. Even the most devoted friends of other candidates have freely conceded them, while on the Democratic side there has been but one expression likewise—namely, in what event they regard Mr. Cleveland as the best practical choice to say the least. If they were to give voice to their real feelings they would acknowledge their candidate's chances are not only problematical but hopeless. It is altogether probable there are Republicans so irresolute, venal and short-sighted—irresponsible of the partisan and narrow sort—they would object to Judge Gresham for no other reason than that the Democrats would vote for him. While the Tribune would never advocate the nomination of any man as a bid for mugwump support, it would be the height of childishness and absurdity to nominate a man for the purpose of preventing their support, or to adopt a policy of nomination which would prohibit votes. To essentially antagonize Cleveland and the united, harmonious Democracy, the republican party needs all the votes it can get. It would be a fatal policy to go into the campaign with the avowed purpose of depriving any citizen from voting for the republican candidate. That candidate must be elected by vote, not by sentiment nor by revenge and if the party is going to conduct its campaign on prohibitory lines with the intent of shutting out any considerable number of voters, why then the jig is up at the outset. The party wants the vote of every man who is entitled to the suffrage, whether he be republican or heathen, white or black, Christian or heathen, white or black, republican, mugwump or democrat. If any candidate at present in the field, or any republican not yet named, can poll more votes than Judge Gresham, who is he?—Chicago Tribune.

On Monday evening last, Mlle. Rhea, the famous French actress, began an engagement of two nights at the Opera House. She will find an enthusiastic welcome awaiting her, for she is not only a great actress, but she is also a woman who has received more social attention than any other actress, native or foreign, who has appeared before the American public. She is a woman against whose name the slightest breath of scandal has never been uttered, who has made her friends who have met her on the stage. Her first appearance will be as "Frou Frou" in the heroine of the celebrated play by Melville and Holly. The Boston Herald says of Rhea as "Frou Frou":

"The play is so familiar to our theater-goers that the representation of Gilbert by Mlle. Rhea was watched with the closest attention, and with more than usually earnest eyes. To say that her interpretation was a thorough enjoyment is only putting a fact mildly. In the lighter scenes of the play Mlle. Rhea showed her talent as an actress, and her performance was a success rather than diminished the interest in her performance, and her art and personal graces, her winning smiles and graceful movements all combined to make her a veritable Frou Frou. Perhaps the most charming of all the scenes was the representation of the heroine in the third act, in which Mlle. Rhea was charmingly supported. In the sterner scenes, that befit the character of the heroine, she certainly fell amidst a storm of applause that compelled the actress to repeat the support was very well balanced, and gave an ensemble that made the whole performance highly effective."
