Mr. Lewis Gives Information About Dead Animals. (Continued from page 1.)

flow so regulated as to keep the absorbent material constantly saturated with it. In any case, the burning shall be continued until the whole of the carcass is consumed in order to destroy every particle of infection.

The trench method of cremating, or burning, is much less expensive than by burning the carcass upon the surface of the ground, as by the former, a draft is created, and with fire above and below, consumption is much quicker and with much less expense of time and material.

A hole, or pit, shall be dug of not less than six feet, so that there shall be space of not less than four feet from the upper surface of the body of the carcass to the surface of the ground.

Where there is suspicion, or the fact known, that an animal has died of a contagious infectious disease, such as carbon, or anthrax, hog cholera, etc., four to six inches of lime shall be placed over the bottom of the hole or pit, the surface of the carcass covered with lime to the same depth, and the hole filled in with earth.

In communities where public animal crematories are available, carcasses may be disposed of in such crematories.

Where possible, and practicable, carcasses shall be disposed of, either by burning or burial, where they lie, or are found.

When carcasses have to be removed for proper sanitary disposal, they shall be conveyed to the place of final disposition in, or on, some suitable vehicle, as a wagon, cart, sled, etc., and not dragged along the road, highway or field, as infection may very easily be spread in this way.

In cases of the removal of charbonous carcasses, especially the natural body-openings shall be plugged up or stopped, with lint cotton or tow saturated with an effective germicidal agent, such as crude carbolic acid, etc., to prevent and disinfect any discharges that would otherwise issue from such openings and leave fresh centers of infection. And the ground on which such carcasses shall have lain, previous to removal, shall be burned over, or carefully and thoroughly sprinkled with a strong solution of crude carbolic acid, the various coal tar dips, or other effective germ-destroying agent, in order to eradicate whatever infection may have been left on said ground.

All vehicles used in the removal of carcasses, and particularly of infected carcasses, shall be thoroughly disinfected with some effective germ-killing agent, such as those already mentioned, immediately after being used. When the vehicles are of little or no monetary value, it is safest to burn them up after using.

While careful sanitary burial in the ground, as above given, may be quite effective, the process of burning, as described, is safer; is the true hygienic method of disposing of carcasses of all kinds; and is one universally recommended, in all cases, when possible, by the Louisiana State Live Stock Sanitary Board.

WOMAN CURES HORSE COLIC. The men were away as usual. The horse was bad. A lone woman could not "drench" in the old way. She called up a neighbor and her men were away—but: "We have Farris Colic Remedy," says Mrs. Neighbor. So she came over and dropped Farris Colic Remedy on the horse's tongue and the horse was well when the men came home. Moral: Get Farris Colic Remedy so the women can cure horse colic. We sell it at 50 cents a bottle on the Money Back Plan. For sale by A. C. McCormack. Adv.
