

lished, and the astronomical authorities on both sides of the Channel applied to the Company for assistance in establishing a connection by a galvanic telegraph between the observatories of Greenwich and Honolulu. The permission was granted, the company behaving in a most liberal manner. Several thousand observations were made, and the success was complete. It may be sufficient, to show the superiority of the method afforded by the use of the electric telegraph, that Professor Airey states that one single observation made by the telegraph gives a more accurate result than can be deduced from the whole mass of observations in the attempt made in 1825 to determine the difference of longitude by signals.

"The former determination is now," says the Professor, "shown to be erroneous by almost a second of time—a large quantity in astronomy—and this correction is nearly certain to its hundredth part. For this gain of accuracy, this veritable advance of science, we are indebted in the first instance to the power of commercial association. Professor Airey may well congratulate the world on the growing tendency towards a closer union between commerce and science. Here is a most important scientific result achieved by the means of the resources of a company which never proposed to itself any such end. The Electric Telegraph Company was a purely commercial speculation. There was no intention, certainly, of employing it to determine the difference of longitude. It was, while carrying on international intercourse, it solved a philosophical problem which has baffled many states as a mere matter of by-play. It might as well display its trumpets forth no grand preparations. The operations of the astronomers caused no interruption of its wonderful activity. It throws off the solution of a great astronomical difficulty as carelessly as if nothing wonderful were to be achieved, and receives the thanks of scientific men.—London Journal.

Revolution in Lima. We have been permitted to make the following extract from a private letter from Lima, to a gentleman in this city. It is of a later date than the news brought by the mail:

As the news of the revolution in Lima will not reach San Francisco for two weeks after the receipt of my letter, I have determined to give the following memorandum, from which you can sketch a short article. The revolution commenced at 4 o'clock, A. M., of August 15, by General Castillo, who had drawn to his colors parts of the Yungay and another regiment, numbering between three and five hundred men, with nine pieces of artillery. He attacked some of the government troops in the quarter, or upon the outside, after which he retired to the Church of the Inquisition. At this attack, the President, Castillo, had command of the government troops. Gen. Castillo issued two proclamations, one to the people of Lima, calling upon them to rise and rid themselves of the tyranny of Castillo; the other was addressed to the soldiers, calling upon them to assist him in accomplishing this end. The President issued a proclamation to the soldiers, asking them to stand by their colors, and to remember the glory they obtained at Palma, which Castillo wishes to tarnish by inducing them to desert the government. After the attack, early in the morning, the government party planted two pieces of artillery on the two streets running from the Plaza, on either side of the Cathedral. All the morning, firing took place from the top of the Church of the Inquisition, and the streets by the government party. The Convention met, and Castillo, the President, called on the Convention to issue a commission to notify the rebels to return to their allegiance, on condition of a pardon. One member objected, because there was not a quorum; the President persisted in his desire. Afterwards, they passed a "decree" calling on the insurgents to return, on condition of pardon. The Convention then passed a resolution, that the Church of the Inquisition should be used as a place of confinement for the rebels. This was caused, I think, by desertion from his ranks, and a disappointment of a rising of the people in his favor. When they retired, they left several pieces of artillery, which were taken possession of by the other forces, who also pursued the insurgents, returning with about seventy-five prisoners and the artillery to the Quarter. The remnants of the insurgents returned peace to the city. Thousands witnessed this revolution without expressing or manifesting any interest in the success of either side. At Callao, every precaution was made in the fort to resist any attack, should Castillo succeed. Three war steamers to port kept up steam all day to meet any emergency. I think you might make a very good item of news from Lima, which will be very desirable, if you can rely on the facts, which I witnessed all except the first outbreak. About forty were killed and wounded.

[From the London Times, Aug. 6.]

The public mind in the United States seems now fully occupied with the Presidential election which is to take place during the coming autumn. There are signs that this struggle will engage, more than on common occasions, the attention and interference of the whole people. It may not be that this is a great crisis; mankind are always apt to look on the events of the present day as pre-eminently important, and in a country like America a four years' term must naturally produce many questions which the result of a Presidential election must determine. Nor can we conceive that there is any danger threatening the Union of the States. They differ in so many ways that the effect is to keep them together. It is not only North and South, East and West, New England and the central States, which have their feuds, jealousies and wars of words, and they remain one, because the only alternative is to make two republics, but four republics, each with its own government. There is no danger that the world will be divided into two, and it is highly interesting to the world at large, and seems to excite great expectations of good or evil in the States themselves. In fact, it is a contest not so much on the material well-being of the country as on its moral policy. Whether Buchanan or Fremont be victorious will make little difference to the farmers whose crops cover the Northern States, to the hardy pioneers of the wilderness, or the mechanics of the great towns. Probably in no country have political changes so little influence on the general concerns of life as in the republic which devotes so much of its time to oratory and declamation. But for some time American citizens have been meditating on certain phenomena of their own society. Those who travel in Europe read the writings of European statesmen, and are struck by the world fully impressed with the extent of American territory, the increase of its population, and the promise of its material greatness, is by no means disposed to propose to itself the American political character as a model. This feeling is not confined to England, which might be supposed to have a younger rival, but extends throughout Europe, both constitutional and despotic. The monstrous inconsistency of slavery in a free republic might be passed over, if there appeared a desire on the part of the people to remove an evil which it might be said was bequeathed to them by the parent State; but when the institution is extended to every part of the territory, and is supported, it is then the natural feeling of the world is alienated even from those who have carried forth the principles of popular government. The war in Kansas, where the opponents of slavery have been expelled by an armed force, whose doings have been sanctioned by the highest authority—the assault on a Northern Senator by a member of the House of Representatives, an action applauded by half the States of the Union, and gloried in to the last by the perpetrator—are sufficient to call men's attention to the future prospects of the community to which they belong. Add to this that the aggressive designs avowed by many politicians are calculated to keep the Union in a state of perpetual unrest, besides determining those foundations of morality by which even a repudiating State on a new continent must be supported, and we have reason enough why men of all classes should look forward to the Presidential election as a decision of the community on questions of the greatest magnitude.

Mr. Buchanan, the democratic candidate, has hitherto been thought by his friends as certain of an easy victory. He will be supported by the South, by the advocates of annexation and absorption, by the conquering faction in Kansas, in short, by all those sections of the population with which he in England have least in common. Mr. Buchanan is understood to have purposely delayed a settlement of the Central American question, and to hold opinions on the subject of an armed occupation of the territory, which are directly opposed to the doctrines laid down at what was called the Ostend Conference, where certain American diplomatists promulgated principles which must subject every weak state to the will of its more powerful neighbor. The Pierce administration has been so little satisfactory to the country that no chance of his re-election existed, and Mr. Buchanan was chosen by the democratic party. We are told that the announcement of his name fell flat on the country; yet, as the chosen nominee of a great political body, he had the best chance of success. Within the last month, however, Colonel Fremont, the republican candidate, has been growing in favor. At the outset he had the courage to speak boldly on the subject of "filibustering" and the armed invasion of other nations' rights without cause of quarrel. The treatment received by the free soil party in Kansas has raised the indignation of the northwest, and swelled the number of Colonel Fremont's supporters. Three months are still to elapse before the election, and it is thought that, if no unexpected event occur, Colonel Fremont will attain the highest place in the American commonwealth. The pretensions of Mr. Fillmore, however, are likely to complicate the struggle. This gentleman will be supported by a great part of the whig party; and the result may perhaps be that neither candidate will obtain a sufficient number of votes, and that the President will be chosen by the House of Representatives. The newspapers which favor Colonel Fremont are, however, sanguine of his success, and, taking the States one by one, they argue as to the probable result of the election. The New England States are, as it may be supposed, likely to support the republican candidate. In Maine the Fremont party is likely to have a large majority. Massachusetts is a large portion even of the democrats are likely to abandon the cause of Mr. Buchanan. The northwest, although sufficiently democratic in principle, is looked upon as likely to support the more moderate politician of the two. But the Central States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, with their millions of inhabitants, will most probably decide the contest. New York has now a population of more than 4,000,000, and, though enjoying no metropolitan status, is, from the greatness of its chief city, naturally most influential in a struggle of popular opinion. We are not ourselves called upon to express any judgment or sympathies in the matter. The opinions of Englishmen may be well divided. They know little of the multitudinous parties which divide American politics, and less of the men who take the lead in the nation. But when freedom is pitted against slavery, and a sense of justice and national right against aggression, they cannot but desire that what they consider the right cause will prevail. It is to be hoped that before another President is installed at Washington the questions now debated between the two nations will be finally settled. So far, therefore, as we are immediately concerned, the decision of the Americans is not of much importance. But in the long run we are interested in the moral tone of the republic; for if the doctrines enunciated in some quarters be accepted by its people, we cannot but fear a succession of troubles and disputes, while, if better counsels prevail, a period of amity and good will may commence, not soon to be disturbed.

PORT OF HILO. Arrived. Oct. 6—Am bk Sarah Sheaf, Tobey, fm Ocholek, 100 wh this season.

Memoranda. Our Lahaina correspondent sends us the following information: A report reached us from Hawaii this day of the loss in the ice, of the brig Tararua and brig Agate—also a schooner, name not given. Two natives who were on board of the schooner are reported to be on their way to Honolulu, and will probably be landed at Honolulu in a few days.
