Washington—Constant German criticism of the American attitude in the war was considered cause sufficient by the United States for the recall of the military attaches with the German armies as military observers. While this is not the official information given out, it is known to be the true explanation. When the news came from Berlin that the American attaches had been withdrawn, it caused widespread comment, and much professed surprise. Press despatches carried the information first, and it was officially confirmed last night.

Germans believe that America's attitude toward Germany is the veriest hypocrisy, and claim that America has been helping the side of the Allies by supplying them with munitions of war and provisions, which they hold to constitute a breach of neutrality which America claims to be maintaining. These opinions were so freely expressed by officials of the German government, as well as by officers in the army, that the position of the American officers as observers became unbearable—hence their withdrawal.
