Everything Has a Use. "Dick Dasher of the Pittsburgh Dispatch has a contemptible opinion of western whiskey that is as good as true. It was at Louisville that a tenderfoot once came in and asked for a whiskey. He was passed a bottle and a glass. Then, to his surprise, the bartender placed a small white broom by the side of the bottle. Of course he was puzzled, but he poured out his drink and drank it slowly, unwilling to profess ignorance in the ways of the wild west, and thinking that some woman might come to his rescue. The door opened, and he saw the man who saved him. A big, burly fellow, bristling with revolvers and bowie knives, stepped in the door, and going up to the bar ordered whiskey in a voice that seemed to come from somewhere below the cellar. A bottle and a glass were passed to him, and, as before, a white broom was added to the layout. The tenderfoot watched the man carefully. He poured out a good sized glassful; then, after gulping it down, quickly picked up the white broom, and brushed over to the corner of the room, brushed away the sand from a portion of the floor. He then lay down and had a fit.—Troy Times.

STORY OF THE MAN WHO WANGING TO STEAL A STEAMER. An Interview With Capt. Alex Hill—How the Waimanalo Happens to Remain.

"Yes, I had planned to take the Waimanalo and go to Tahiti," said Captain Alexander Hill yesterday afternoon. "Had the Marshal given me six hours more I would have been off. There is no use in telling lies about it. Once in the South Seas the Waimanalo would have made me the best kind of a trading vessel. I was going to Tahiti because there no questions would be asked about papers."

Hill is no fool. He tells a straightforward story, giving the black and white of his scheme without reserve. He looks at the venture in which he was caught as a smooth one, and seems to feel no compunction or humiliation at its failure and his crime. His conscience is simply suffering from an overdose of idleness.

The steamer fancier is a German, though burdened with an American name. His speech has the proper ring, but his English words snag on German chords breaking them up distressingly. He has an open face, and looks like a man who would not walk away with a steamer for a dozen of them. He was eighteen months with Captain Blumh on the W. H. Talbot and says that notable will vouch for him in any port.

Hill has been here about ten months. He was a member of Company A and followed Captain Smith through the war. Prior to this time he was mate on the Waimanalo. One day he had a racket with Captain Davis and knocked that celebrity down. Only a few weeks afterward he succeeded Captain Davis on the steamer.

Hill says he planned to run away with the steamer because he was being watched by the police. "I had a perfect horror of being arrested," said he. "For some days I thought of those small rooms with iron bars over them down at the prison, and it kept me nervous all the time. I planned to take the steamer. One man on her with me in this. I went to Fred Meyer and asked him to go. He consented at once. Then the woman said she would go too. That made four in the party. We were to go around to Waialua, finish taking on supplies, and then pull out. In four weeks we calculated to reach our destination."

"The morning we were to leave Honolulu I discovered that the thing had been given away. I was arrested soon after, and then made a clean breast of it all."

Hill says that the Marshal stopped him before he had committed an offense. "I did not actually attempt to steal the steamer either," said he, "because Mr. Hitchcock would not give me time." He intended leaving Waialua as soon as supplies could be taken aboard. A part of these "supplies" was a lot of rice that would have been disposed of in the south.

Hill says he will leave Honolulu in a few days, going first to America. "In San Francisco I am going to publish an article telling the people what kind of friends I had in Hawaii," said he. From San Francisco he expects to make his way to Adelaide, where he claims to have a brother of considerable fortune. Hill is only twenty-six years of age, and perhaps has time to reform some of the rickety points in his make-up.
