The Old Man's Bible.

BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

The old man panted awhile, and then
He drew his Bible out,
Wish that he never failed to clear
Each mystery or doubt;
And said to Harry—"In this book,
'Tis written plain and sure,
That what we do, not what we have,
Will make us rich or poor.

"There's not a rich man ever reached
Heaven's high and pure abode;
There's not a rich man entering now,
The straight and narrow road;
Unless he makes his mate, his wealth
A staff and not a load—
A staff for others—mark you well
The good Samaritan,
How rich he grew by what he gave
The helpless wounded man.

"Take all the books wise men have made,
They darken while they read;
But if you learn the Bible lore,
You will be wise indeed.

And then, when you have learned the right
But one rule need be given,
Do it—and sure as God is good,
You will be smother'd of heaven."

The Kremlin at Moscow, and the Coronation of Alexander II.

The Kremlin is an ancient fortress and an encincture of pompous palaces and venerated churches. The most noted entrance is the so-called Redeemer's-gate, or Holy-gate, an entering which all must uncover. Here, too, is that great fractured bell, so celebrated in history, travel, and description for its size and incapacity of function. The Treasury contains the habits of ceremony worn by the Sovereigns of Russia at their Coronation, studded with gems and pearls like an Elizabethan petticoat. Capt. Jenkinson, who in the latter half of the sixteenth century was sent from England to conduct the Russian Ambassador to Moscow, received an invitation to see the Emperor's treasury and wardrobe, and describes two "godly gowns as heavy as a man could easily carry, all set with pearls over and over, and the borders garnished with sapphires and other good stones abundantly," and he was particularly enjoined to procure such or better in England, and told that the Emperor would gladly bestow his money on such things. To the Imperial Treasury also belongs a long ivory comb with which the ancient Czars combed their flowing beards; and, last not least, the regalia of the conquered and absorbed Khanates of Kasan, Siberia, Astracan, and the Crimea. For it must be remembered that these four last provinces have a large substratum of Turkish and Tigran population in which the Muscovites are only settlers. The thrones are of ivory or silver, and in the neighboring hall of warlike trophies is the litter in which Charles XII. was borne from the Battle of Pultava.

Previous to the conflagration of 1812, the most prominent edifices of the Kremlin were the ancient palaces of the Czars, the architecture being a compound of Renaissance and Oriental. Their principal architect was a Milanese named Solario. All travelers to Russia previous to 1812 speak of the picturesque magnificence of the principal palace, which after the conflagration had to be taken down. The two portions remaining of the old palaces of the Czars have been repaired by the Emperors Alexander and Nicholas; and two additional palaces, a larger and a smaller, have been built by these Monarchs in the place of the old principal palace. The room of the Emperor Alexander is shown containing his handkerchief, pencil, and note book. The room of the Emperor Nicholas contains the hard mattress on which he slept, and the library in his cabinet comprised all the books that had been written about Moscow in various languages.

The principal ecclesiastical edifice in the Kremlin is the Spenskiy Sabor, or the Cathedral of the Resurrection, in which the Emperors are crowned. The whole of its interior is gilt, and on the golden ground Scriptural frescoes have been executed according to the Byzantine taste, as travellers may remember to have seen in Italy and the Levant. The Cathedral of the Resurrection is a sort of Greek Loretto, from the value of its sacred paraphernalia. It was plundered by the French in 1812, but the most valuable pieces had been removed on the approach of the enemy's armies, and restored on their departure. One is a Mount Sinai of pure duodecim gold, equivalent to a hundred and twenty thousand dollars, or fifty-four thousand pounds sterling. On the summit stands a golden Moser, with a table of the law, and within the mountain a coffin containing the host. This magnificent present was from Prince Potemkin. Kohl relates with incredulity that there is a picture of the Saviour, which the priest who showed it stated that "a merchant lame in both hands and feet was brought there, and after he had prayed fervently before this picture rose up healed and walked out of the door which he had been carried through in his bed." We see no reason to doubt this statement of the priest; the active agent, however, not being the inanimate image of the Saviour, but the animate imagination of the fervent believer terminating with vivacity a torpor in the electrical circulation of his physical frame. Truly may we say, if this theory be a sound one, that by faith the merchant was made whole.

It was in the thirteenth century that Moscow became the residence of Princes springing from the family of Rurik; but in point of mere antiquity there can be no doubt that Novogorod and Kiev are much older. But from Moscow having been from the thirteenth to the eighteenth century the capital, both political and ecclesiastical, it possesses an historical and archaeological interest far beyond these incunabular cities of the Russian dominion; and the residences and occupations of the Sovereigns keep up the interest of the palace even to the present time. Now is Moscow a shadow of its former self, but still a reality from its large population, and from its still being the residence of a considerable nobility.

The ceremony of Coronation which is about to take place has national peculiarities not unworthy of being noted. On the arrival of the Imperial family deputations of the nobility and citizens offer them bread and salt on magnificent silver trays, as an emblem of hospitality; and afterwards, on the banks of the river Moskva, water is consecrated in presence of a large population. Then there is a cavalcade of heralds through the streets of Moscow, stopping at every cross-road and public square to proclaim the proximate coronation.

On the day of the coronation the insignia of Sovereign authority—the crowns, the scepter, the orb, the Imperial purple, the mantle and the ornaments intended for the Empress—are carried in procession to the Cathedral, and received by the clergy at the entrance with clouds of incense. The Emperor than proceeds, accompanied by all the great dignitaries, from his palace at the porch. The clergy advancing to meet him at the porch. The Patriarch, in his full pontificals, having on his right the Archbishop of Kiev, and on his left the Archbishop of Moscow. The Patriarch presents the cross to the Emperor and Empress to kiss. The Archbishop of Kiev sprinkles holy water on the ground about to be trodden, and the Archbishop of Moscow compliments the Czar in a speech.

The religious service then begins, and "Hallelujah" is sung by the chorus; after which the Patriarch asks the Emperor if it pleases his Majesty to make a public profession of the Catholic orthodox faith; and at the same time he presents the Creed to the Czar, who reads it. The Emperor, who is then robed with a purple mantle, ordereth he crown to be brought, and on receiving it from the Patriarch crowns himself; after which the Patriarch uses the following remarkable expressions—"This visible and outward ornament which adorns the brow is the symbol of the mysterious act by which Jesus Christ, the King of Glory, crowns thee at this moment—thee, the Chief of the people of all Russia—by means of His holy blessing, confirming thee in thy absolute and supreme authority.

The Coronation is thus assumed to be symbol of the reception of temporal power from the Divinity (the antipodes of the doctrine of the people being the source of all legitimate power). The holding of the scepter and the orb is assumed to be symbolical of the immediate relation of the Sovereign to the people as Autocrat; not the passive reception of power from on high, but the active exercise of it over those below. The Emperor then crowns the Empress, who kneels before him, and they take their places upon their thrones. The choir then sings the Coronation Anthem, while all the bells of Moscow ring, and a salute of a hundred and one guns is fired. The Emperor then prays that he may be enabled to fulfill the mission that has been intrusted to him; and, after some other ceremonies, the Emperor takes the Sacrament, and is anointed; the Archbishop of Novogorod taking a golden branch and touching with oil the brow, eyelids, nostrils, lips, and ears of the Czar, as well as the palm and upper part of the hand. Formerly it was not lawful for the Prince to wash the parts anointed with the sacred oil before seven days; but now they are wiped away by the Bishop of Kiev. Thus ends the ceremony of the Coronation. Then comes the banquet which the Czars give to the Patriarch, the clergy, and the dignitaries. The grand cupbearer and Imperial carver, who are great personages, practically perform their functions; Coronation medals are then presented to the Emperor by the Master of the Mint; and in the evening the city and Kremlin are illuminated, and on such occasions the lofty and fantastic tower of the Ivan Vodka is illuminated to the apex.—London Illustrated News.
